The last article of the Constitution is, that the ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same." These conventions are bodies raised under the Constitution, by which no quorum is provided, and, under the construction contended for, must mean the whole bodies by which it has not been ratified. If the construction then be correct, the Constitution can be of no effect, unless it has been ratified by them unanimously, which has not been done.

When we use such terms as House, people, or quorum, we always mean a majority, otherwise we should run into absurdity; and gentlemen will see, that in all cases where the terms are not restricted, they mean a majority, and that in other cases where a different meaning is intended, restrictive language is used.

In that part of the Constitution respecting the election of President, if the construction of gentlemen be sound, the words "whole number" are superfluous; it prescribes "that each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof shall direct, a number of Electors equal to the whole number of Electors for Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress." The word State does not here mean all the people, but a majority of them exercising political power through the members of their Legislature.

In the case of the President refusing to approve a law, the words are the same as in the present instance. In such a case I should suppose the Legislative bodies were sitting in their Legislative capacity; and in such case, notwithstanding, according to the ideas of gentlemen, two-thirds of the attending members would be insufficient to pass the law.

In the case of the amendments agreed to in 1789, sixteen members were present. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. DENNIS) has stated that the whole body consisted at that time of twenty members; but the fact is, it consisted of twenty-two, two-thirds of which are fifteen. Sixteen were present. I find the amendments were opposed by some members, and gentlemen will agree with me, that where members are in the habit of opposing measures they will not be likely to vote for them. The inference is that some of the sixteen voted against the amendments on their final passage. I ask if the fair inference be that only one member voted against them? If more than one voted against them, according to the doctrine of gentlemen, they were not constitutionally passed, and therefore we are legislating under amendments to the Constitution, which are not part of the Constitution, inasmuch as they were not constitutionally proposed.

Mr. R. GRAISWOLD.—The first objection made by gentlemen to the motion which I have had the honor to submit is, that this House has no right to inquire into the fact of how the Senate passed the resolution on our table. It is said by the gentlemen from Tennessee and Delaware, that we had no right to inquire further than into facts as they appear on the face of the resolution. This doctrine I did not expect. What is the resolution? Is it anything more than a record of the proceedings of the Senate? Is not the Journal of that House also a record? And suppose, instead of receiving this resolution, as we have received it, without information of the yeas and nays on its passage, the Senate had sent us a record of those yeas and nays, would the gentleman then say that we had not a right to draw an inference for ourselves as to whether it was or was not passed by a Constitutional majority? The Secretary in this case has only brought us part of the record. When we see the whole, we perceive how it has passed, to wit: twenty-two members voting in the affirmative, and ten voting in the negative; and whether the whole record is brought by the Secretary, or whether we receive it in any other way, is altogether immaterial. For from the whole record we must at last decide. This is a sufficient answer to the comments of gentlemen. We have a right to view the whole record, and to determine from it whether this resolution has been regularly passed.

The next objection is, that precedent is against us. But the fact is, that when the amendments alluded to by gentlemen, were passed in the Senate and House of Representatives, all the members were not present; and instead of taking the yeas and nays on them, the Secretary of the Senate and of the House made a record that they were agreed to by two-thirds of the members present. Gentlemen infer from this fact that they were not passed by two-thirds of the whole members, but I do not perceive how they draw the inference. I admit that it was assumed by those who made up the journals, that all that was necessary was the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present; but it does not appear whether two-thirds of the whole members did or did not concur. This precedent therefore concludes nothing. Hence we are brought back to the Constitution, to put our own construction on its several provisions; and I submit it to the House, whether its language is not clear, plain, and definite. The fifth article requires the concurrence of two-thirds of each House. What is meant by House? It must mean either a quorum to do business, or the whole of the members. To determine what it means we must refer to the Constitution, and see how the term is there used. The first expression of it is the third section, "the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State." This is perfectly clear and definite; you cannot compose the Senate in any other form. But gentlemen say that the term Senate is used in a different sense from the term House, and in one the meaning is different from that in the other. If gentlemen will turn to the fifth section of the first article, they will find this language: "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications, of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business." What is meant by a majority of each House? Barely a majority of a majority! This is nonsense; the term House then means every member; it is clear that such was the meaning of the framers of the Constitution. I say, therefore, that when these parts are taken altogether, we obtain a clear and definite construction of what they meant by the terms House and Senate.

It is true there are some instances in which House means a quorum, such are the cases in which ordinary business is transacted, in which the House adjourns or expels a disorderly member. The words are there synonymous, yet in its strict meaning the word House means the whole number of members, and all cases where it is intended to have a different meaning are provided for by the Constitution. In the fifth section of the first article it is said, "the yeas and nays of members of either House on any question, shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal." Why introduce this language? For the plain reason that without it one fifth of the House, that is of the whole number of members, would be required. This construction comports with the just remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMITH) that every exception to a general rule should be construed rigidly—that is, in the present instance, without an exception, one-fifth of the whole of the members will be required. So in the case of impeachments and treaties, unless the expression were two-thirds of the members present, the concurrence of two-thirds of the whole would be necessary. Gentlemen will see in all these cases, as the honorable member from Pennsylvania says, the exception proves the thing. While there is no restriction to two-thirds of the members present, or to a majority, the Constitution must be construed according to the general principle.

It is not my wish to detain the House longer on this subject. I have expressed myself in general terms. I add, that it is proper, that in an affair of such importance, we should proceed with deliberation and caution. The subject is a new one, and it can do no harm to discharge the Committee of the Whole and take it up seriously. Some gentlemen are of opinion that there are precedents which apply to the elucidation of this point; if the committee shall be discharged, they will have time to search for them, the resolution can be referred to a select committee, the journals be examined, and the House enabled to proceed with caution and deliberation.

Mr. ROONEY stated two precedents, in his opinion, in point. One of which took place in May, 1802, in the House of Representatives, on an amendment to the Constitution embracing the same principle with the present. The House then consisted of one hundred and six members, two-thirds of whom were seventy-one. By the journals it appeared that an engrossed resolution of an amendment passed—yeas 47, nays 14.

Another precedent fresh in the recollection of gentlemen, had been made this session. An amendment containing the same principle had passed that House; the whole number of members of which was 140; of which ninety-five constituted two-thirds; and yet it would be found that it passed by 88 votes for, and 31 against it.

Mr. LOWNDES replied that the amendment which had passed this House in 1802, had been agreed to in great haste at the close of a session; the act was inadvertent, and therefore was not entitled to much weight.

Mr. HUGER required the taking of the yeas and nays; at about 4 o'clock the question was accordingly taken—yeas 34, nays 85, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, December 7.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH called for the order of the day on the amendment to the Constitution, received from the Senate.

Mr. HUGER moved to postpone the order of the day. He observed that he had very seldom, since he had the honor of a seat in the House, originated business. It was contrary to his habits to obtrude himself upon the House; and he would not undertake the task of originating business but from a strong impulse of duty. He was against altering the Constitution; but as it was probable that an alteration would be made, he considered it his duty to render it as little prejudicial as possible. This he believed would be the case, if the resolution he had laid on the table for dividing the United States into Electoral districts, was incorporated into the resolution from the Senate. He found that this resolution had been proposed not only by the Legislature of New York, but likewise by the Legislature of South Carolina. It had also been submitted in a former Congress by a respectable member from a respectable State, (Mr. NICHOLAS.) Mr. H. said that this could not be considered as a party question, as it was probable the Federal party would lose strength by its adoption; it was probable the members on that side would oppose the amendment. The principal hope of success was from the aid of those who generally differed from him in political sentiment. Mr. H. concluded by moving a postponement of the order of the day till to-morrow, to enable him in the mean time to submit the resolution for Electoral districts.

Mr. G. GRISWOLD agreed with the gentleman from South Carolina, that it was important that both amendments should go to the same committee. He was in favor of the amendment for districts—not, however, because he considered himself bound by the instructions of the Legislature of New York, given long since. On a former occasion, when this subject was before the House, some of his colleagues had thought themselves bound by those instructions, and had expressed astonishment at his resisting them. He was not disposed to question the correctness of their opinions, but for himself he could never consent to be bound by such instructions against the dictates of his own judgment. He was not the representative of a Legislature, but of a section of the people, and did not represent the State, but those combined with other sections of the people. He had a right then to express his own opinion. It so happened, however, that this resolution for electoral districts accorded with his own opinion, and therefore he should advocate its adoption. According to the reasoning of gentlemen, this resolution should be considered as the first in rank, as it was first named in the resolutions agreed to by the Legislature of New York. Will gentlemen who advocate the last, (embracing the principle of designation,) reject the first, or neglect to pay it the same attention with the first? He should consider the vote against postponement as a virtual vote against the first resolution. Is it not fair and proper that both these points of amendment should go to the same committee, as they both relate to the same subject? He was in favor of the division of the United States into electoral districts, as it carried to the people directly the election of Electors, which is now three degrees removed from the people, whereas by the amendment it would be only two degrees. We may be told that the Legislature of New York may, under the Constitution, if she pleases, district the State; and we may be asked why she does not do this if desirable. This question Mr. G. could not undertake to answer. Gentlemen of similar political sentiments with the majority of that Legislature can best answer it. He could only say that, if in the Legislature, he should be in favor of it. Mr. G. concluded by saying he was not in favor of altering the Constitution at all, with regard to the election of President, but if it were altered, he was in favor of uniting the amendment for electoral districts with that on the table. He should therefore vote for the postponement.

Mr. ELLIOT did not rise to reply to the arguments of gentlemen, but merely to express his surprise that those who wished no amendment whatever, should thus labor to defeat the wishes of the House. He had expected that one amendment to the Constitution would have been sufficient for a session. Yet we had sent one to the Senate where it reposed, and in return they had sent us three. If these are not enough, where are we to stop? He hoped gentlemen would not add another until these had been acted on.

Mr. RODNEY only rose to say that he was in favor of dividing the United States into districts, but was decidedly against an amendment to that effect being incorporated with the one on the table, lest by grasping at too much they might lose all.

Mr. G. GRISWOLD did not perceive how the agreeing to the amendment for electoral districts could embarrass the present amendment, as it was in the power of the different State Legislatures to agree to a part, if they saw fit, and not the whole.

Mr. THOMAS observed that, in legislating, he had always been adverse to incorporating different subjects in the same bill or resolution; because he thought each should stand on its own bottom. He said the resolution sent from the Senate proposes an important amendment to our Constitution, and the one which his colleague, (Mr. G. GRISWOLD,) and the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HUGER) wishes considered, at the same time proposes another important amendment. Although he was in favor of both, he considered it highly improper to blend them together. He thought each ought to stand or fall on its own merits. My colleague, said Mr. T., appears to have a high reverence for the people's opinion, in affecting to support this amendment at this moment; but why has he suffered this zeal to slumber for these five or six weeks, since which this House passed a resolution similar to the one sent from the Senate? Why did he not call this up before? Why has he suffered this thing to sleep all this time, and at this moment urge its being taken up with such warmth? I am unwilling, Mr. Speaker, to impute to gentlemen improper motives for their conduct, but I must confess this looks too much like an intention to embarrass and procrastinate the passage of the other amendment to admit of a doubt.

I am, said Mr. T., decidedly against considering this proposition at this time. Let us take up the one sent down from the Senate, and when that has been agreed to, as I trust it will be, and sent out to the States for their consideration, I pledge myself to those gentlemen that I will unite with them in not only considering, but will support the other proposition.

Mr. MITCHELL said he felt it incumbent on him to offer a few remarks on the proposition to amend the Constitution from the Legislature of New York. It might seem as if a large share of gratitude was due to the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HUGER) for his care of that State, if his remarks were not coupled with a tacit reflection on those who represented it. He would concisely state the history of this proposition. During the first session of the seventh Congress, two propositions of amendment to the Constitution were received from the Legislature of New York, which the Representatives of that State were requested to endeavor to have incorporated into the Constitution. At that time, said Mr. M., I did myself make a motion to bring forward both these propositions, and they were both referred to a Committee of the whole House. They remained in this state for a considerable time, under the consideration of the House. Towards the close of the session one of them was adopted by this House, but was lost in the Senate. The other was not acted upon. I recollect that I informed the House at that time, that it was not my wish to have the first proposition taken up. The reasons which then induced me to be against taking it up were those which will influence me against voting for taking it up at this time. I do consider that however a State Legislature may instruct their Representatives in Congress, they have a right to refuse obedience to their instructions. I consider it a sound doctrine that, in a Government like ours, the Representative has a right to act according to the best dictates of his judgment. So judging for myself, I did believe that the first proposition was of such a nature as rendered it inexpedient to make it a part of the Constitution. My further reflection since that time, and intercourse with my constituents, make me believe that it is inexpedient to bring it forward at this time. Independent of this consideration, I shall be opposed to the taking up this proposition at this time on other grounds. There is certainly a much better chance of wisely deciding on amendments singly, than by taking them together. Were I a friend of the proposition, I would be for considering it separately.

Mr. DANA said he was in favor of the postponement, in order to make some disposition of the motion of his friend from South Carolina, (Mr. HUGER.) He thought there would be an impropriety in making two distinct amendments on the same subject at the same session. He was not a friend to the proposition, but wished to postpone it to the next session to put it out of the way.

The yeas and nays were then taken, at the instance of Mr. HUGER, on his motion of postponement, and were—yeas 34, nays 86, as follows:

YEAS—Simeon Baldwin, Silas Betton, John Campbell, Martin Chittenden, Clifton Clagget, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, John Dennis, Thomas Dwight, Calvin Goddard, Gaylord Griswold, Roger Griswold, Seth Hastings, David Hough, Benjamin Huger, Samuel Hunt, Joseph Lewis, jun., Thomas Lewis, Henry W. Livingston, Thomas Lowndes, Nahum Mitchell, Thomas Plater, Samuel D. Purviance, John Cotton Smith, William Stedman, James Stephenson, Samuel Taggart, Benjamin Tallmadge, Samuel Tenney, Samuel Thatcher, George Tibbits, Peleg Wadsworth, and Lemuel Williams.

NAYS—Willis Alston, jr., Nathaniel Alexander, Isaac Anderson, John Archer, David Bard, George Michael Bedinger, Phaniel Bishop, William Blackledge, John Boyle, Robert Brown, Joseph Bryan, William Butler, George W. Campbell, Levi Casey, William Chamberlin, Thomas Claiborne, Joseph Clay, John Clopton, Frederick Conrad, Jacob Crowninshield, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, William Dickson, John B. Hanna, Josiah Hasbrouck, Daniel Heister, Joseph Heister, William Hoge, James Holland, David Holmes, John G. Jackson, Walter Jones, William Kennedy, Nehemiah Knight, Michael Leib, John B. C. Lucas, Andrew McCord, William McCreery, David Meriwether, Samuel L. Mitchell, Nicholas R. Moore, Thomas Moore, Jeremiah Morrow, Anthony New, Thomas Newton, jr., Gideon Olin, Beriah Palmer, John Patterson, John Randolph, jr., Thomas M. Varnum, Matthew Walton, John Whitehill, Marmaduke Williams, Richard Winn, Joseph Winston, and Thomas Wynns.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole—Mr. VARNUM in the Chair.

The amendment from the Senate having been read, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That in lieu of the third paragraph of the first section of the Constitution of the United States, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the Legislatures of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, to wit:

The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots, the person voted for as Vice President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and all persons voted for as Vice President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit, sealed, to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates; and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest number, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President; but in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other Constitutional disability of the President.

The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President, shall be the Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States.

Mr. ELLIOT moved to amend the resolution from the Senate by striking out the following words:

“And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other Constitutional disability of the President.”

When, said Mr. E., the final question on the amendment to the Constitution passed some time since this House, which contemplated the simple principle of discrimination, I contented myself with a silent vote in favor of it. I should remain silent on this occasion, had I not, by intervening circumstances, been placed in a peculiar situation. My colleague, a short time ago, laid on the table a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State which I have the honor to represent, with singular unanimity, by which the Senators of Vermont were instructed, and the Representatives requested to use their utmost exertions to obtain an amendment to the Constitution containing the simple principle of designation. This request was mingled with another, that we should not be tenacious of the form if we could obtain the substance. I felt happy on this occasion not to be under the necessity of discussing the principle how far a Representative is bound by the instructions of his constituents, as I never possessed a sentiment hostile to the principle of discrimination. I do believe that my constituents, of both of the parties which divide America, are almost unanimous in their approbation of this principle. But I do not believe that the people or Legislature of that State wish to combine with it any other principles. However I may myself be in favor of the great principle of discrimination, I do not consider myself under any obligation to vote for it, if combined with other principles, which I think tend, in a tenfold degree, to introduce a greater evil than that at present to be apprehended, to wit: to introduce a person to the Presidency, not contemplated by the people or the Electors. I sincerely believe the resolution from the Senate, if adopted, will have this effect. I have likewise objections to the language in which the resolution is couched. In the Constitution, as it now stands, it is prescribed that the House of Representatives shall elect a President, in case there be no choice by the Electors. It appears to me inconsistent, almost in the same breath, to say you may choose or not choose, as is virtually declared in the present resolution. You may reject all the candidates for the Presidency, and introduce a person intended for a different office. It appears to me improper to use this imperative language, and at the same time allow a wide discretion; not that I believe the framers of the Constitution intended to coerce the physical or moral volition of the members of the House of Representatives; but I believe they intended, by the strongest language which could be used, to discontinue the idea of no election. To this we owe the last election by the House of Representatives. I will ask, what would have been the result, if, instead of this simple dignified language, this temporising language had been used? You may prolong your session to the fourth of March, and if there shall not be then a President elected, the President of the Senate shall be President of the United States for four years. I believe that the language of the Constitution ought to be imperative; but if it ought not, still it ought not to say you may choose, in the same sentence that it says you may not choose a President.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

With this view of the subject, I cannot satisfy my mind to vote for the amendment of the Senate. I believe it is the wish of the people to amend the Constitution, simply so far as regards the designating principle. I believe that they do not desire many amendments to the Constitution. Three or four distinct amendments are embraced in the proposition of the Senate. I am in favor of one amendment only. I am not prepared to vote for any other. If this motion succeed, it may be proper to strike out other parts of the proposition from the Senate. It will then stand as we sent it to the Senate, or an additional provision, if it shall be considered necessary, may be introduced, for an extraordinary election by the people, in case the House should not elect the President, which will be perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. HUGER said it was unnecessary for him to repeat arguments already so fully urged, to prove the improper nature of the amendment from the Senate. But, though he should ultimately vote against it, yet he considered it his duty to render it as unexceptionable as possible. He should, therefore, vote against the motion made by the gentleman from Vermont. If any amendment of the Constitution were necessary, this was, in his opinion, precisely the one. It had been well observed in another place that man was man, and that this nation must ultimately be prepared to meet and resist the vices attached to human nature. If we could always calculate upon having our councils filled with men of virtue, the Constitution itself would scarcely be necessary. But all constitutions and all laws were predicated on the vices of men. Mr. H. said it had always struck him as a most important circumstance, and as one that might lead to the most fatal consequences, that the election of a President should absolutely depend on the votes of the House of Representatives; and that, if these votes should prove equal, there would be no election. The time might come, and would come, when the election of a President would be brought into that House, and when they would make no choice.

Mr. CHITTENDEN declared himself in favor of the amendment of his colleague. If the election of a President should be brought into the House of Representatives, it would be known who had been voted for as President, and who as Vice President. It would only then be required to frustrate the election of a President to make the Vice President President. He believed there was no danger to the rights and liberties of the people, by suffering the Constitution to remain as it was.

Mr. SKINNER said he believed the great States ought to have some rights as well as the small. He had always considered the Constitution as formed upon principles that gave the small States as extensive rights as were reasonable, and that gave them power enough to make them secure in the enjoyment of those rights. As to the designating principle, he was fond of it. He believed it was a sound principle that a majority should govern. But he could never agree, but from absolute necessity, to make a provision that would offer a strong temptation to an individual to intrigue, and would enable one-fourth of the representation of the people to frustrate an election. He did not think this provision necessary, as he did not believe the period would ever arrive when a majority of that House would not obey a solemn Constitutional injunction. He was therefore in favor of striking out that part of the amendment which eventually devolved the Presidency on the Vice President, in the case of no election in the House of Representatives. He would rather take the amendment without this provision; and he did not know whether he would not reject the whole, rather than adopt this provision.

Mr. HOLLAND was in favor of the amendment from the Senate, as better than the one sent from the House. He had always thought the Constitution faulty from the want of this provision, and experience had shown the necessity of it. In the case of a non-election in the House of Representatives, (were it a possible case,) this provision was calculated to remedy it. The only objection now urged, is, that the House of Representatives may act corruptly. Mr. H. would not give into this idea as possible, yet it was very possible that some circumstances might arise which would prevent the House of Representatives from making an election. Some great disaster might occur—for instance, the House might fall, and crush the members to death.

Mr. SMILIE.—The Senate have made two alterations in the propositions that went from this House. The only thing for us to consider, is, whether they are of such a nature as to render it better for us to adopt or reject the entire resolution. The Senate appear to have considered the difficulties and evils lately experienced, and to have provided against their recurrence. To this provision gentlemen now except. This amendment, which it is proposed to strike out, is in favor of the small States. Notwithstanding this, I, as a Representative of a large State, shall not reject it. We have heard, on this occasion, a great deal about State interests; but I have never witnessed an instance in which it has influenced the decision on any question of great importance. And if the time ever does arrive, when local interests shall direct the Councils of our country, we need care little about the Constitution. Be this as it may, those who think this amendment renders the Constitution better than it now is, will vote for it. We must consider the other branch of the Legislature as participating with us; and in order to obtain a correspondence of opinion with them, we must conciliate. As I consider this amendment as a grave for the whole business, I shall vote against it.

H. OF R.

Mr. THATCHER expressed himself in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Vermont. As to the idea of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SMILIE,) that we must take this resolution from the Senate, or nothing, I do not know whence he draws his inference. I should suppose we ought to make the amendment as perfect as possible. Are we to adopt what we think totally improper, because the Senate approve it? What, in my opinion, principally renders this resolution exceptionable is, that it carries the election of President from the popular to the federative branch of the Legislature. The friends of each candidate will be induced to scatter their votes, and thus, aided by the influence of the Senate, prevent an election in the House of Representatives. There will not, in such event, exist the same inducements to make an election, flowing from a dread of the evils of anarchy and of an interregnum. Another objection also, in my mind, is powerful. The effect of this proposition will be to send a number of candidates into the House, not the three or five highest on the list, but the three highest numbers, containing an indefinite number of persons. One consequence must follow, either that the election will come into the House, or that the large States will combine together in order to prevent it.

Mr. LOWNDES said he was in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Vermont, for the reasons which had been already urged. It appeared to him that, under the propositions received from the Senate, the Vice President would intrigue with the members of the House of Representatives. Having the whole patronage of the Government in his hands, in case of success, he may work upon them, as he believed, that though they were not corrupt now, they might be hereafter. If the object be to prevent the recurrence of a late event, that would be easily effected by providing that in case of an equal vote in the House of Representatives for President, lot shall decide; and if the present motion prevailed he would move an amendment to such effect.

Mr. DANA said he would make a motion, the object of which was to abolish the office of Vice President; he therefore moved to strike out the following words:

"And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of a choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other Constitutional disability of the President

"The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President, shall be the Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then, from the two highest number on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice.

"But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States."

The motion being more comprehensive than that of Mr. ELLIOT, superseded it.

Mr. SANDFORD observed, that if the gentleman would have waited a short time his motion would have been decided upon in determining the principle of designation. If there were no Vice President, no designation would be necessary.

He said he was against the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, and in favor of the resolution from the Senate.

Mr. DANA.—Notwithstanding the admonition of the gentleman from Kentucky, I shall assign my reasons in favor of the motion which I have submitted. The more I have reflected on the subject the more I am convinced that we ought not to agree to the amendment on the plain principle of discrimination. If the resolution is to pass in any form, it is my wish that it should pass with this modification. It has been referred to as a reason for altering the Constitution, that it is a fact, that the will of the people will be in favor of one of the candidates for the Presidency, and that it will not become the House of Representative to choose from the two equal in votes, according to their discretion. The object of the amendment is to guard against this evil. Gentlemen will well recollect the indignant eloquence that was so copiously lavished at the last Presidential election upon those who voted for one of the candidates. This competition cannot exist, if the office of Vice President does not exist. But it is said that one public benefit will result from the continuance of the office of Vice President after the adoption of the discriminating principle, that is, that the Vice President will be the eventual successor of the President. But on this view of the subject, the adoption of the discriminating principle produces a great change in the present provision of the Constitution. The Vice President is to exercise, in case of his succession to the Presidency, the duties of that office, until the expiration of four years, from the election of the President; not until a new election is held, but for the remaining term. This amendment makes the Vice President a secondary character. The reasons, therefore, for continuing the office of Vice President are not so great under this amendment, as under the Constitution, as it at present stands; for it will be extremely easy to make provision for the temporary filling of the office of President, in case of vacancy. In Pennsylvania, and in several other States, this provision is made by the designation of a particular existing officer. Gentlemen may be convinced there is no necessity for this office, if the discriminating principle prevails, by a recurrence to the Journals of the Grand Convention. From them it will appear, that there was originally no idea of a Vice President; but that it was explicitly agreed that the Senate should choose their own President. The necessity of a Vice President did not suggest itself until the idea of a double ballot was introduced. In one point the members of the Convention were agreed, to wit: that the Supreme Executive should consist of one person; but as to the manner of appointing him, the term of his office, and whether he should be eligible in future, there existed great diversity of opinion. The first plan was that he should be chosen by the National Legislature, by the joint ballot of both Houses: it was then proposed that he should be chosen by the people, but this was disagreed to, as well as a proposition that he should be chosen by the Electors appointed by the State Legislatures; a proposition that he should be chosen by Electors appointed by the people, was likewise disagreed to. All these different propositions were disagreed to, until the principle of double ballot prevailed.

DECEMBER, 1803.

H. OF R.

Unless some great good result from the office of Vice President, no argument for its continuance can be deduced from the necessity of having an eventual successor; that case can easily be provided for, when the Senate choose their own President, and, as in many of the States, the President of the Senate may eventually preside.

The principle of the Constitution is this: In the Senate the representation of the States is equal, but by introducing into the chair of the Presidency of the Senate a representative of a State, you give to that State the advantage of having the man who presides over the deliberations of the Senate; and, in addition to this, when the votes are equal, he holds the balance, and one State, having thus three votes, in particular cases, destroys the equality contemplated by the Constitution. To this amendment there is another objection: the Vice President under it being but a secondary character, that office will become a lure to ambitious men, who, by flattering the States, and by the exertion of undue influence, will enable particular parties to make a bargain as to the possession of the Executive power, which, so far from being a benefit, will be a great evil. Perceiving no good that will result from the continuance of the office, but great evil, in case the discriminating principle prevail, I am in favor of abolishing the office, though I am at the same time in favor of the Constitution remaining as it is.

Mr. ELLIOT.—As the motion I submitted is superseded by that of the gentleman from Connecticut, I will assign a few reasons for the vote which I shall give. I originally contemplated the same motion, but with different views and sentiments from those expressed by that gentleman. I have no desire to abolish the office of Vice President; nor do I think the arguments urged by the gentleman possess any force. I have a different view. I believe the principle of discrimination is the only amendment of the Constitution which the public sentiment calls for, and I wish to make no amendment in which we are not anticipated by the public sentiment. I shall, therefore, vote for the motion of the gentleman, but under different sentiments, and with a different object.

Mr. R. GARSWOLD.—The gentleman from Kentucky will, on examination, find the amendment of my colleague not inconsistent with the spirit of the resolution. The object of that resolution is, that every Elector shall give a vote for President. If the office of Vice President shall be abolished, every Elector will give one vote, and that vote will be for President. It may be said, it is true, that the discriminating principle will be done away; but it may be answered that it is no longer necessary. I am clearly of opinion, if we adopt the discriminating principle it will be useless, worse than useless. If that principle is adopted, of what use can the Vice President be? For what purpose do we want him? To receive $5,000 a year? This may be beneficial to him, but it cannot be useful to his country. The office may confer honor on him, but the honor of an individual can be of no public utility. Will he be wanted to preside in the Senate? That will not be necessary, for the Senate sit half their time without the Vice President, and I have not understood that the business is not as well done without as with him. For what purpose, then, will you have this officer? As heir apparent to the Crown? If this is your object, select him from the best and greatest of your citizens, and do not adopt the principle that the Electors shall vote for one man for President and for another as Vice President.

What will be the effect of this principle? The office of Vice President will be carried to market to purchase the votes of particular States. A large State, having numerous Electors, and claiming a right to designate the President, but not having votes enough itself for that purpose, will carry the office of Vice President to another State, and will say, give us the President and we will give you the Vice President. If it be your desire to consider the Vice President as heir apparent to the Presidency, elect him not in this manner, for he must be the mere child of corruption! With these views, I am justified in saying the continuance of the office will be worse than useless, inasmuch as it will only tend to introduce a system of corruption. It will also give a particular State great weight in the Senate, by giving it three votes, and the presidency over that body. Why do this? Under the old Confederation all the States were equal. Why unnecessarily impair that great principle? Why give to the State from which the Vice President is selected this power, together with influence of another kind? For these reasons, I am of opinion that when gentlemen determine to discriminate, they ought to go the full length of the principle. If they agree to amend the resolution, it may be so altered as to make every part of the Constitution correspond. Gentlemen will observe that I am discussing their principle, and that though I think the Constitution far better as it is, yet if the discriminating principle is to prevail, I think that the amendment proposed by my colleague will render the resolution far less exceptionable.

The question was then taken on Mr. DANA'S motion, which passed in the negative—yeas 34.

Mr. ELLIOT'S motion recurring—

Mr. ELLIOT said he could not suffer the question to be taken without noticing one argument urged by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who conveyed the idea that, as the resolution had passed the Senate, we must either take it as it is, or lose it altogether. From what premises this conclusion was drawn he was not able to discover, as he had observed before; after laboring for weeks on the resolution which embraced the discriminating principle, and we had agreed to it, the Senate have not acted on that, but have sent us another, to which he was decidedly opposed. He could not but believe that a spirit of accommodation would actuate the Senate if we struck out this part of the resolution; but if he did not believe this, he would not even then sacrifice his ideas to the opinions of the Senate, nor adopt the doctrine advanced by gentlemen of an imperious necessity. To this doctrine he would always oppose the dictates of duty and conscience. For he did believe, if they adopted the resolution from the Senate, they would render the Constitution pregnant with greater evils than it was at present.

Mr. GODDARD was happy to see the notice taken by the gentleman from Vermont of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. If these remarks were just, we might as well be done with business at once. Are our minds to be trammelled with the decisions of the Senate? With great deference to that body, he would not suffer his mind to be bound down to their will. We have passed a resolution with a discriminating principle, they have sent us another resolution with other principles. Suppose they had said, if there were no election in the House of Representatives, the Senate should choose the President, would the gentleman from Pennsylvania vote for it? There was another effect of the resolution of the Senate; it would be giving to the large States both the power and the premium to combine in the election of the President. By the discriminating principle, you vest the large States with the power of making the President, and through the medium of the Vice President you give them the means of effecting that object.

The question was taken on Mr. ELLIOT'S motion, which passed in the negative—yeas 38, nays 81.

Mr. CHAMBERLIN moved to amend the resolution by striking out, in the second clause, the words "persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three," for the purpose of inserting the words "five highest."

Mr. DANA called for a division of the question.

Mr. SANDFORD could not help again advising the gentleman from Connecticut. The object of the motion seemed to be to defeat the whole business by sending it back to the Senate. He trusted the question would be taken on the main resolution, on which every member, he believed, had made up his mind.

Mr. CHAMBERLIN did not know by what spirit of divination the gentlemen penetrated into his motives. He had expressed no motive but to render the Constitution as perfect as possible, having previously expressed a wish not to change the Constitution as it at present stood.

Mr. GODDARD.—The gentleman from Kentucky is opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Vermont. This subject has been considered before. The numbers three and five were then before us, and gentlemen with great deliberation settled five as the best. So the resolution went from us, and it comes back again with the number three. The gentleman says he is for three, and intimates that it is the object of the motion of my friend to defeat the whole business by sending it back to the Senate! As the amendment stood, Mr. G. did not understand it, "the highest number, not exceeding three," could not certainly mean only persons having three votes.

The CHAIRMAN said the word "number" was a misprint; in the manuscript it stood numbers.

Mr. GODDARD said if a classification of persons were intended, the principle was the same.

Mr. ELLIOT was equally at a loss, with others, to discover the motives ascribed to his colleague in making this motion. Some gentlemen say his motive is to defeat the whole resolution. How defeat it? By making it conform to the resolution sent by this House to the Senate. How long is it since some gentlemen, now in favor of a precipitate decision, in protracted debates threatened, if the number five were not introduced, that they should vote against the whole resolution? It was astonishing that what they themselves were so lately friendly to, should now be calculated to defeat the whole object!

Mr. E. said he was prepared to lose the discriminating principle forever, rather than incorporate with it the principle sent down by the Senate.

Mr. SMILIE said he was sorry to see the gentleman warm without occasion. He was one of those originally in favor of the number five, but had uniformly declared that that circumstance should not prevent him from agreeing to any number, provided the principle of discrimination were adopted. But gentlemen think it strange, said Mr. S., that I should utter an opinion that the effect of sending this resolution back to the Senate, will be to defeat it. Such was my opinion when I uttered it, and I think so still. I also said that I did not like the amendment from the Senate so well as our own; but, liking it better than the present provisions of the Constitution, I was in favor of its adoption. When two bodies have to agree, there must be a mutual spirit of concession, or business can never be transacted. This concession takes place every day. I repeat, then, what I said before, that those who believe this the best amendment we can get, ought to vote for it.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD.—The first question is on striking out the words "persons having the highest number, not exceeding three." If gentlemen will critically attend to these words, they will perceive that, in order to make sense of the resolution, or to accomplish their object, they must strike them out. I know perfectly well that it is disagreeable to enter into verbal criticisms in public bodies, and that they ought not to be made on ordinary occasions; but, when we are amending the Constitution, it is proper to make it as plain as possible, and to convey our ideas in apt words, which shall not admit a construction different from that which we intend. I ask gentlemen to tell me the meaning of these words: "and 'if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose.'" &c. To what does "three" refer? Either to persons or to numbers. I conceive it clearly applies to numbers. If so, what will be the effect? Then "from the persons having the highest numbers"—of what? number of votes. It will then read, that the elections shall be confined to persons having three votes, and consequently persons not having precisely three votes, cannot be elected. This is not the intention of gentlemen, to exclude those having the greatest number of votes, and to confine the choice to those who have only three votes, and yet the word "numbers" must refer to the last antecedent. I do not know how it came about that the Senate introduced this absurdity into their resolution; but I do hope that the members of this House will look to it, and see whether they are not doing a different thing from what they intended. Surely it is not the object of gentlemen to send an amendment to the people, either different from what they intended, or so obscure as not to be intelligible.

I am inclined to think the idea of the Senate was to confine the election to three classes of persons. I am of opinion that they have not used the apt and proper words to convey this meaning. I ask gentlemen to read over the resolution. I will venture to say three-fourths of the people who shall read it, will think it is intended to confine the election to three persons; and yet, I understand, it is the intention of the Senate only to confine it to three classes. This may, perhaps, be the true construction of the words, but, in amending the Constitution, we ought to render it as clear and explicit as possible; so clear and explicit that every man who runs may read. I therefore trust that gentlemen will take up this resolution, and render it so clear as to avoid all doubt.

Mr. DENNIS said, whatever might be the precise grammatical construction of the words proposed to be stricken out, he believed that nineteen-twentieths of the people would place that construction upon them that made persons and numbers synonymous. It was immaterial to him whether the existing obscurity were removed by striking out these words, or introducing additional expressions. He thought it could not be denied that the words admitted of different constructions, and that they ought not to leave a principle so important to a variety of interpretations; but ought, on the contrary, to use language the most accurate and pointed. He hoped gentlemen would exercise a due degree of indulgence to those who did not understand these words as they did, and agree to remove their obscurity. For this reason, he was in favor of the motion to strike out.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said, that this was not the first time that the House had been sent back to their accidence and ferula, to Lilly and Ruddiman, to solve the doubts of gentlemen from Connecticut. Since such was the case, he recommended a recurrence to a well known rule, in all cases of difficulty as to concord, to ask the question, who or what? He concurred with the gentlemen in the position, that, in all cases of construction, where the sense would warrant it, the relative was to be referred to the last antecedent. The choice is to be made out of "the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three." Three what? numbers—what number? highest numbers. Will the gentleman undertake to maintain that not exceeding the three highest numbers is the same as not exceeding three in number? That three numbers and the number three are one and the same? But, whether the numeral three agree with persons, or numbers, the sense contended for cannot be made out. If it refer to persons, then the choice is to be made out of those persons, not exceeding three, having the highest numbers on the list. If to numbers, which was the evident construction, then the choice was to be made from those persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD said, this expression was not so clear, in his opinion, as the gentleman from Virginia thought it. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. SANDFORD) says, the word "numbers" refers to persons, while the gentleman from Virginia says, they refer to the three highest numbers, which may refer to forty persons, if they should be equal. When doctors disagree, what is to be done? I think the different construction of gentlemen, as well in favor of as against the resolution, shows the necessity of clothing it in language that will remove all doubt. If this were an amendment of a law, the obscurity of the language would not be so material, as it would be in the power of the Legislature at any time to alter it; but, being part of the Constitution, it will be out of their reach.

Mr. SANDFORD could not see the difference between his construction and that of the gentleman from Virginia. The gentleman from Vermont had charged him with voting for the number five, and being now in favor of three. Mr. S. said, he did not vote for the number five, and he would ask that gentleman if he would not allow him to show the same spirit of accommodation that actuated himself in voting for three instead of five? The same spirit would induce him to vote for the resolution of the Senate, since they had not acquiesced in our proposition.

Mr. HUGER, after impressing the propriety of removing the obscurity of the language contained in the resolution, moved that the Committee should rise.

Motion lost—ayes 32.

Mr. ELLIOT.—It is a task of delicacy to decide whether the gentleman from Kentucky, Connecticut, or Virginia, is the best grammarian. I believe, however, that the palm of grammatical learning and verbal criticism will be found to be justly due to the gentleman from Virginia. On this occasion he has been extremely ingenious; but, in undertaking to prove that there is no obscurity in the language of the amendment, I conceive that he has failed in his object. The very ingenious mode in which he has managed the subject has convinced me there is obscurity in it. He says it is immaterial to which of the antecedents the words not exceeding three refer. I do believe, though perhaps less conversant with Lilly, or Ruddiman, or Webster, than the gentleman, that it refers to persons and not to numbers. He has asked the difference between the three highest and the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three? If the expression should be the three highest numbers, and it should happen that two persons have thirty-five each, and four persons sixteen each, it will, I apprehend, be extremely difficult to determine which are the three highest persons. I believe, also, that, according to this construction, the gentleman who think five involves too great a discretion, will consider the extending the number to thirty will be still more exceptionable; but, we are told, notwithstanding all the obscurity and other defectiveness of this resolution, we must pass it, as it came from the Senate, lest by sending it back it may be defeated. But, I will prophecy, though, like Cassandra, my prophecy may not be believed until it is verified by time, that this resolution, though passed by us, will not be adopted by the State Legislatures. This, time will determine. For these reasons, I am in favor of erasing these words, that others may be introduced less susceptible of grammatical criticism.

Mr. BALDWIN inquired, whether the expression "that the election of President, in the House of Representatives," should be confined to "the persons having the highest number, not exceeding three," did not imply that the House might, if they chose, confine the election to two; and whether on such election, there must not be a previous question decided, whether the word "three" related to persons or numbers? How was this to be determined? The choice of a President is to be by States. How is this question to be settled; by the whole of the members? If so, what will be the consequence? The four States of Virginia, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, and Massachusetts, having a majority of all the members on the floor, their combination may limit the number to two persons, and thus exclude the candidate who might otherwise have been voted for by the thirteen other States. Considering the effect of this construction, and of the different constructions put upon the language of the resolution, by other gentlemen, and that the language of the Constitution ought to be so correct as to free it from a variety of constructions, Mr. B. hoped the House would pause, and, before they gave the amendment its final passage, make it as free from ambiguity as possible.

Mr. RODNEY would detain the Committee but a few moments. He said he might be permitted to remark that, accustomed to consider subjects on principle, and to act himself under the best impressions of his judgment, he was willing to give credit to others, and to believe that they also acted on the same motives. He agreed with his friend from Virginia as to the construction proper to be put upon the amendment. By attending to every part of it, according to the rules of syntax, it appeared to him that no doubt could exist, on the most mature reflection, as to its proper construction. "The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then, from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President." The Committee will observe, that, in the previous part of the paragraph, the term, number of votes, is used, and that reference must be had to it in construing the meaning of those words through every subsequent part of it. He believed that, by a simple reading of the paragraph, it would appear that three does refer to numbers. To give a just construction to any sentence, we must use every part of it, and not exclude a single word if we can give it meaning. Taking this as a sound rule, and giving effect to the term, highest, the argument of gentlemen is answered. They pretend to say, when they find the expression, the highest numbers not exceeding three, that the highest on the list are to be excluded, and the choice to be confined to persons having only three votes. The House is to take the highest numbers—the three highest, whether more or less. As the Constitution now stands, it says, if no person have a majority, the House shall choose by States from the five highest. A case might occur where six of the candidates would have equal votes. What would be the consequence? The Constitution confines the choice to the five highest; there would, in that case, be returned to the House six candidates equal and highest. To remedy this defect, the amendment is so framed that, instead of tying down the House to a choice from five persons, it authorizes it from the three highest numbers. Gentlemen object to this by saying that it allows a wide scope, and permits the House to choose a person, having, perhaps, but one vote. And is not this the case at present? Suppose the two highest have all the votes but three, and that three other persons have but one vote each, the case will be precisely the same. Mr. R. confessed that it was so long since he had left school, that he was not able to repeat the rule of grammar to which he had referred, but it did appear to him, when reference was had to a substantive qualified by an adjective, it was proper to take both together. No instrument was so perfect but that, if the parts were taken separately, it might not be rendered nonsense. He had learned, somewhere, that a clergyman, reciting in a place of worship the old version of the Psalms by Sternhold and Hopkins, had said—

“The Lord will come, and he will not—Keep silence, but speak out”—

A sailor, who happened to be listening, thinking the man crazy, and all who heard him, immediately left the house. So, in this case, the gentleman, by a similar species of ingenuity, may make this or any other resolution, perfect nonsense.

Mr. DANA said it was not his purpose to enter into a grammatical disquisition. To understand correctly the meaning of particular words, it was not necessary to refer to the authority of grammarians. When they understood the principles of grammar they did not want those authorities. He rose merely to observe that on the first reading of the resolution, many gentlemen entertained different ideas from those expressed by the gentlemen from Delaware and Virginia, some gentlemen considering the term, highest, as referring to persons, and others to numbers; as had been observed, the punctuation would decide it one way or the other—the construction might depend on commas. On a question in which the passions are so apt to be engaged as in the election of a Chief Magistrate, the language ought to be plain. He did hope, therefore, that where all agreed in principle, all would agree to clothe it in language that would free it from obscurity.

Mr. ELLIOT moved that the Committee should rise.

This motion was lost—ayes 36, noes 66.

The question was then taken on striking out, and lost—ayes 29.

Mr. THATCHER said that in the first paragraph of the resolution, the following expression was used: “when ratified by three-fourths of the Legislatures of the several States.” It appeared to him that this expression required the ratification by three-fourths of each Legislature, and not, as expressed in the Constitution, of the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States. To make the phraseology conform to the Constitution, he moved to substitute, in the room of the former words, the following: “when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States.”

The motion was lost without a division.

The question being then stated on the resolution generally—

Mr. ELLIOT said, as the Committee were not disposed to hear him, and as he felt quite exhausted, he should not, on cool reflection, trouble them with the full remarks he intended to make, but should, when the amendment came into the House, ask for a division of the question, and offer a few remarks in support of the opinions he held.

The main amendment was then agreed to—ayes 75, noes 26.

The Committee having risen, and the Chairman having reported an agreement to the resolution from the Senate, without amendment, the House immediately took the same into consideration.

Mr. CHITTENDEN said, as this was an important question, requiring, in his opinion, more time for deliberation, he would move an adjournment.

The yeas and nays being taken on the adjournment, were, yeas 30, nays 77.

Mr. DANA renewed the motion, made in Committee of the Whole, for so altering the resolution as to abolish the office of Vice President by striking out so much thereof as is contained in the words following, to wit:

“And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

“The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President, shall be the Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and, if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice.

“But no person, constitutionally ineligible to the office of President, shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States.”

And on the question that the House do agree to the said amendment, it passed in the negative—yeas 27, nays 85, as follows:

Mr. G. GRISWOLD moved to strike out "two," and insert "three," being the number of candidates for the Vice Presidency, from whom an election shall be made by the Senate.

The motion was lost without a division.

Mr. ELLIOT moved a division of the question on agreeing to the whole amendment at the word Vice President in the second paragraph. And on the question that the House do agree to the first member of the resolution in the words following to wit:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That in lieu of the third paragraph of the first section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the Legislatures of the several States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, to wit:

"The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote, by ballot, for President and Vice President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name, in their ballots, the person voted for as President, and, in distinct ballots, the person voted for as Vice President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice President."

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 30, as follows:

The other member of the resolution was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

"And of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit, sealed, to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate; the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and, if no person have such majority, then, from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose, immediately, by ballot, the President. But, in choosing, the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum, for this purpose, shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

"The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President, shall be the Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and, if no person have a majority, then, from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice."

"But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States."

The SPEAKER put the question on the whole resolution.

Mr. ELLIOT.—I shall detain the House but a few moments in submitting to their attention a few remarks. If the vote I shall give this night shall induce my constituents to call me back to the studious and rural life from which I was reluctantly taken, I shall have the consolation to reflect that I have done my duty. I have voted for the simple principle of discrimination, believing it the only amendment the public voice calls for. I believe the objections to that principle to be founded on ideas that are erroneous and visionary; I believe it will not impair the rights or relative importance of the smaller States; I believe the Constitution to be founded on elementary and federative principles, and that, by their union, it constitutes the most illustrious monument of human wisdom; I believe it important to all the members of the Union that the process of election should be simple and pure, and that the President should be elected by a fair expression of the public sentiment, that he may, thereby, be the correct organ of the public will; and that, compared with this, it is of little consequence whether once in a hundred years he may be a citizen of Massachusetts rather than of Virginia, or of Vermont rather than of Delaware. I have heard many ingenious arguments on a former occasion, without being induced to believe that either the rights or relative importance of the small States would be impaired by this principle; but, in deciding on this subject, I also believe this House ought to manifest caution and deliberation in making the alteration. I believe that all irritation and pride of party should be laid asleep. A different course from this has been pursued to-day. I have no doubt, with pure motives, but I have some doubts whether with becoming judgment. I believe the amendments incorporated into the resolution of the Senate, to be infinitely more important than gentlemen may imagine. This can only be demonstrated by experience. I venture to prophesy this resolution will not be adopted by three-fourths of the States.

I hope it never will. I believe, if adopted, it will jeopardise the union of the States, and open a door to intrigue and corruption, which gentlemen should wish to close forever; and I believe instead of making the Constitution better than it now is, it will make it infinitely worse. We are about to increase tenfold the probability of introducing a person into the Presidency not calculated for that office, and to increase the avenues by which corruption and ambition may be advanced to supreme power. I am comforted by the assurance that I shall not be the only member friendly to the Administration that will give it a negative, and that this will induce gentlemen to believe that I do not vote from irritation or prejudice. Neither birth, wealth, talents, nor connexions, introduced me to public favor. I am induced to believe that I owe that distinction to a conviction of my personal integrity; and, though I do not wish to use the language of arrogance, I expect that the vote I shall give this night, instead of lessening, will increase the favorable opinion of the Republicans, and if, on any future occasion, the people of this country shall be under the necessity of mourning over their departed liberties, of lamenting the destruction of a Constitution, the work of so much toil, labor, and wisdom, by the passage of this resolution, and perceive my name recorded in the negative, they will remember the prediction I have made on this occasion.

The resolution was then agreed to, and the question was put on engrossing it for a third reading.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH moved that it be read a third time to-day.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD moved that it be read a third time to-morrow. He hoped it would be postponed till to-morrow. This was the first moment, during the progress of the resolution, in which it was in order to discuss its merits. They had been already eight hours in session. All the previous deliberations of the House had been taken up in amending the resolution, and now when its merits came to be discussed, he trusted a majority would not be in favor of precipitating a vote. The merits of the amendment had not been fully discussed, and if ever it was important that any measure should be deliberately discussed, it was the one about being adopted, which went to change the radical features of our Government. He concluded by moving that the yeas and nays should be taken on the third reading of the resolution to-morrow.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said that the gentleman from Connecticut had called on the House, to use his own words, not to precipitate a decision on an important measure, contemplating nothing less than a change of a fundamental principle on which the national compact was founded. I will ask you, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. R., and that gentleman, whether in the whole course of this business, from the first motion to amend the Constitution to the present time, such precipitation can be justly charged on the House? I ask him as a man of honor, whether a postponement until to-morrow can affect a single vote? I ask whether he believes a single member has not made up his mind on the subject? I ask him and the House, whether in the course of this day and yesterday, and on previous occasions, all the great bearings of this resolution have not been sifted, and every line and sentence carped at by critics and hypercritics? Why then are we charged with precipitation? Yesterday it was moved to postpone the resolution; that motion was lost, and on that occasion the object of gentlemen was carried though their motion was lost, for the day was consumed. The same course has been pursued to-day, and on incidental motions to amend particular parts of the resolution, gentlemen have debated its merits. I ask you, therefore, if the resolution has not been discussed in every point of view of which it is susceptible, or if any new matter can be introduced? I ask if the House be disposed to postpone the question until to-morrow, and if the day shall be consumed in making and discussing the same evasive motions made to-day, whether an attempt to take the question then will not be charged with precipitation? There can be no doubt that, unless we adopt the peculiar course of gentlemen, we shall still be charged with precipitation. I for one am willing to submit to this charge, and am willing to hear it urged within and without these walls. If I did not believe the question had been fully discussed, and that further discussion would fail to change a vote, I would acquiesce to postpone it until to-morrow, or the next month; but believing the contrary, I shall be against it.

Mr. ELLIOT—Some of the gentleman's remarks are so extraordinary, that I cannot, I will not suffer them to pass unnoticed. It is immaterial to me what the gentleman from Connecticut, or Virginia, thinks on this subject. Some gentlemen may think the mind of every gentleman fixed; some gentlemen may rely on a degree of personal influence, which I trust will never be realized, and that some gentlemen will take their opinions on the subject from others. But be this as it may, I think it improper to put the queries submitted by the gentleman from Virginia, at the first moment when it is strictly in order to debate the merits of the amendment. Good Heavens! is it come to this, when most material amendments are about to be made in the Constitution, and after an extraordinary degree of irritation and fatigue, when one day more is asked for, the gentleman from Virginia shall get up, and ask if every member has not made up his mind on the vote he shall give; after two new principles are introduced in the resolution sent from this House, which, though confined to the simple principle of discrimination, occupied a month's discussion?

I do not accuse of improper motives the majority of this House, with whom it is my pride and pleasure on most occasions to act. I believe they sincerely think it for the interest of their country that this important decision should be immediately made. I know that the State I represent has manifested great zeal and uncommon unanimity in favor of the discriminating principle. Impressed with its importance, they have, contrary to their usual course, submitted to the inconvenience of an extra session, in the expectation that this principle would be adopted by the two Houses. But I believe that not a member of the Legislature of that State will be gratified, that so many important amendments, additional to this, have been made after the discussion of a single day; the greater part of which has been consumed in the discussion of incidental points. I do not believe that the people of the United States wish us to spend day after day in examining the merits of a private claim, and to give but a single day to the making of three or four alterations in the Constitution, without allowing a single member an opportunity of discussing any but incidental questions. These are my opinions. I do not believe, however, that they will be accepted by the majority as of any weight. In making them, I mean no reflection on the majority. Yet I believe the majority may, without offence, be informed that even a humble minority have rights as well as they, and that while they feel power they ought not to forget right. These are my reasons for hoping another day may be devoted to the subject.

Mr. GREGG said he would vote in favor of a postponement, were he not persuaded that the question had been fully discussed. It would be recollected that two of the propositions, contained in the present resolution, had been on a former occasion before the House, and had been ably discussed. These same propositions now appeared in a shape somewhat different in form, but the same in substance. They related to the principle of discrimination, and to the number of persons from which the House of Representatives should elect a President. It would be conceded that these two questions had been as fully discussed as they could be. Everything the subject admitted of had been already advanced. The remaining principle, embraced by the resolution of the Senate, authorizing the Vice President eventually to become President, has been also fully discussed on the motion by the gentleman from Vermont. That gentleman calls this an incidental question; but without deciding whether it was an incidental question or not, Mr. G. believed it questionable whether anything could be added to what had been advanced. Another motion had been made to do away the office of Vice President. This likewise had been discussed. These four propositions embraced the whole of the resolution from the Senate; and although there may have been no discussion on the whole of it, yet as there had been a full discussion of all the parts of which it consisted, the effect was the same.

Mr. HUGER said he must exercise the liberty of disagreeing with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The fact was that the question of discrimination had never been fully discussed. When it was first before the House the gentlemen in the majority acted as if all acquiesced in it. Its real merits had not been, therefore, entered into by them. The only question discussed was, the number from which a choice should be made by the House of Representatives. That was fully done. What then followed? On the main question, Mr. H. said, he was almost the only one, who really went into a discussion of its merits, the gentlemen on the other side had not thought proper to make any answer.

MR. DANA.—After having been before Congress for ten years, and the members of the House having spent three days in discussing the petition of Amey Darden for the price of a horse, the amendment of the Senate, to the Constitution is brought before us; and after but two days discussion, we are now called up to decide finally upon it. I do not ask gentlemen to change their opinion, but I require them to have some regard to common decorum; and that when it is unusual on the most ordinary occasions to read a bill the third time on the same day that it has been discussed in a Committee of the Whole, they will not urge a measure of the first importance, which goes to reverse the ideas of our wisest men, to a precipitate decision, in violation of this common rule. This is all I ask, and no more. When gentlemen say there is nothing new to be advanced, I acknowledge myself willing to pay great respect to their intuitive judgments and reach of thought, I do not pretend to say they have not this eminent qualification; but I must say that few men possess these vast powers of mind. It might be arrogance in me to say that I could add anything to what has been so ably urged, particularly in the other branch of the Legislature. Yet I might perhaps present the subject in a light somewhat different. Gentlemen are graciously pleased to say they will hear patiently what we have to advance; but to say they will hear us patiently, when four hours have elapsed since the usual time of dining, is giving us but little indulgence; the exhaustion of the Speaker, and the impatience of the House are such discouragements as a speaker is not accustomed to bear. For these reasons I hope the business will be permitted to take its ordinary course, and the third reading of the amendment be postponed until to-morrow.

MR. BEDINGER urged the necessity of coming to an immediate decision, as the State Legislatures would be exposed to serious inconvenience by further delay. The Legislature of Kentucky would, he understood, adjourn about Christmas. This business had begun with the session, and he was persuaded the mind of every member was made up on it.

MR. R. GRISWOLD hoped the Legislature of Kentucky would not become extinct on their adjournment, and, if not, when they meet again, they could take up this amendment. He trusted, therefore, the House would not precipitate a decision on this account. He could not promise himself, if indulged with time, with the ability to make any observations that would convince the judgment of a single member. Indeed, it was a melancholy truth, that the temper of the House was such as to indicate no change. Gentlemen say, they have made up their minds. He still thought it proper that the subject should be fully discussed on that floor, as the State Legislatures were ultimately to decide. He wished to see it discussed everywhere, on the floor of the House as well as in the public prints. He hoped, also, a respect for the dignity of their proceedings would restrain gentlemen from calling for a decision at so late an hour. It was not usual to carry a bill to the third reading on the same day with its discussion in a Committee of the Whole. This may have been practised some at the close of a session on unimportant subjects, but had never been practised at the commencement of the session. For these reasons, he hoped the subject would be postponed until to-morrow, when he would offer his opinion on it. It was certainly true, that the gentlemen in favor of it had hitherto refused to discuss its merits. He did hope that, before a final vote was taken on the amendment of the Senate, they would come forward, and, divesting themselves of party sensibility, show the grounds on which they advocated it.

The motion to read the resolution a third time to-morrow, was rejected by yeas and nays—yeas 45, nays 74, as follows:

The engrossed resolution was then read the third time; and on the question, Shall the same pass?

Mr. PURVIANCE said, as I am aware that this question will induce a lengthy discussion, which may not be terminated until to-morrow, I move an adjournment.

Motion lost—ayes 30.

Mr. P. rose again. Fatigued as I am, said he, by the long time we have remained in session, and not having had time to prepare myself fully on the merits of the question, though impelled to trouble the House with some ideas, they shall be few, and shall be concisely expressed. I am against the amendment, for several reasons. First, because it is calculated to injure the interests of the smaller States. This point having been ably discussed, I shall merely remark, that it is more than probable, should this amendment obtain, the President, for more than one hundred years to come, will be confined to some person within the five large States of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and North Carolina. The whole number of Electors consists of one hundred and seventy-six, of which eighty-nine make a majority, and the number of Electors attached to these States are ninety-six. The amendment confines the number of persons from whom the election shall be made, if brought within these walls, to three; and two must, at all events, be chosen by one of the larger States. If the Constitution remains in its present state, the number brought into the House will be five, whereby the smaller States will have a better chance of getting one or other of the two officers. This idea must have operated forcibly on the minds of the persons delegated to consider the Constitution, and had it not been for that number being so large, the smaller States might not have come into the Union. Having come into the Union, with rights so guarded, and expecting a continuance of them, it is now extremely improper to deprive them of that chance which, if not held out, might have prevented the adoption of the Constitution. We know that the Constitution was regarded as a compromise between the large and small States, in which the large States made considerable concessions to the small States, and induced them thereby to come into the measure. If this amendment is not a violation of the compact, why may we not further alter it, and say that the ratio of Representatives in this House may be as one to one hundred thousand, by which some States may be deprived of any representation whatever? One measure is as just as the other.

In the second place, I am against the amendment, because it does appear to me that a sacred right of franchise, a right of choosing our governors for ourselves, for which ourselves and our fathers fought and bled, is now to be made a kind of job, a subject of barter, and the Constitution so altered as that one State may say to another, if you consent to give us Titius, we will, in return, agree to give you Caius; and, if you do not give us Titius, we will not give you Caius. Thus, the five larger States will always enjoy the power of choosing the President. The time may arrive, though God forbid it should! when this country may become corrupt, when persons, candidates for the great Executive offices, may, by promises of ample compensation, influence the Electors. In the third place, I am opposed to the amendment because the office of Vice President is still retained, when the original reasons for it are entirely done away. We know that the principal reasons for creating it were to bring forward two of our ablest characters, without discrimination, and to keep all intrigue from being interwoven in the election of the Chief Magistrate. This object is done away, and the office is retained at the expense of five thousand dollars a year, when the duties attached to it might as well be discharged by some other person, as is the case in every State in the Union, where there is not a Lieutenant Governor. In North Carolina, and in other States, where the office of Governor becomes vacant, it is provided that it shall be filled by the Speaker of the Senate, and eventually by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

But, in the fourth place, I am opposed to any innovation on the sacred charter, because when we shall have once begun to make incursions on it, there is no knowing at what point of progress we shall stop. It is extremely probable that we shall not stop, until some of the fairest features of the system, are crumbled into dust. This is my strongest reason against the amendment. For, I believe, that, if it is adopted, not a session will pass without other amendments, until the whole system shall be destroyed. As for myself, while one fragment of this sacred charter remains, I will hug it to my heart and cherish it as I would the vital juices of my existence. I believe that it is now absolutely perfect, and that, if it shall be once invaded, the work of destruction will not be arrested until the happiness and liberties of our country are destroyed.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

Mr. ELLIOT.—I wish to place the reasons on which I shall vote, on the present occasion, beyond the reach of misconception. I do not agree with the gentleman from North Carolina as to the effects of this amendment upon the large or small States. I dread no collision between them. I am in favor of one principle, viz: the designation of office. I am opposed to the other principles contained in the amendment, because I believe them fraught with more evil than this is with good. I therefore think the amendment will make the Constitution worse than it now is, believing as I do that it may bring a man into the Presidency, not contemplated by the people for that office. On this ground, I am opposed to this resolution. I am also opposed to it, because it makes more alterations in the Constitution than the people wish, or than, I think, necessary. It is my wish to preserve all the prominent features of the Constitution in their original simplicity. Another objection with me is, that the language is unworthy of the Constitution; that it is absurd and contradictory; that it commands the Representatives to elect a President; and, at the same time, gives permission not to elect; and that, in such an event, it makes the Vice President President. Believing, therefore, that it is fraught with the most pernicious consequences, and may jeopard the interest of the Union; believing that the people, though now virtuous, may at some future day become corrupt, and that the language is absurd, inconsistent, and undignified, I shall give my decided negative to the resolution, although it embraces an important principle, which I wish incorporated into the Constitution.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said that the remarks which the House had just heard rendered any apology for addressing them unnecessary. The friends of the amendment had been repeatedly called upon to assign their reasons for supporting it. In order to avoid, as far as was possible, taking up the attention of the House unnecessarily, he had reserved such observations as he intended to offer for that stage of the discussion. To state the reasons which induced him to vote for the proposition then before them, and to repel the imputation of inconsistency which had been thrown out, was his object. He did not hesitate to acknowledge that he would have preferred the amendment which had been sent to the Senate, or one which went to abolish entirely the office of Vice President, to that which was then submitted to their consideration. But on this, as on every other political question, where principles were not at stake, he should adopt the practice which he had heretofore pursued, of acquiring that good which was within his grasp, without putting everything to risk, merely because he was not gratified in every matter of detail. This sentiment was obnoxious, he very well knew, to the reproach which had been thrown out against gentlemen, for displaying too great a deference to the opinions of the other branch of the Legislature. He had, however, no hesitation to avow his disposition, whilst he adhered inflexibly to certain principles, to vary the modification of those principles, so as to meet the wishes of those with whom he had the honor to act. And whilst he should always feel a disposition to show a deference to the opinion of the Senate, this was, he conceived, an occasion which entitled the sentiments of that body to more than ordinary respect. It would be recollected that the act of the two Houses of Congress on any amendment of the Constitution was very far from being conclusive: that the State Legislatures must finally determine upon any proposition of that nature, which might be submitted to them, and that in making such a proposal we must consult not merely our own opinion, but, whilst we adhered to the object in view, we ought to offer it in that shape which was most likely to prove acceptable to them. The opinion of the Senate, therefore, the immediate organ of those Legislatures, and the surest index of their temper and disposition, was, on an occasion like this, entitled to peculiar respect: for it would be idle to offer to the States propositions which there was no prospect of their accepting.

The amendment in question embracing the great object which he had in view, the designation of the person voted for as President, and of him voted for as Vice President, he was disposed to adopt it, although the modification of that principle was not precisely what he could have wished. But who could expect to be gratified to the utmost extent, in a matter where so many various opinions and interests were to be reconciled! A pertinaciousness of that sort would inevitably have prevented the adoption of the Constitution under which they were then deliberating. It is not, therefore, sir, (said Mr. R.) because I conceive this to be the best possible amendment of the Constitution, but because I believe the Constitution will be more unexceptionable with it, than without it, that I shall give it my vote, and on the same principle, and on no other, did I support that which has previously received the sanction of this House. In most respects the two amendments are the same. The difference between choosing "out of the five highest," and out of "the highest numbers, not exceeding three," will hardly be insisted upon as material. It may not be improper here to remark that the Constitution, as it now stands, and the amendment which we offered to the Senate, are both open to the same criticism which has been reiterated so frequently against that under consideration: the words "five highest" being referable either to numbers, or to persons. The only part of the resolution, therefore, substantially at variance with our own, is that which enjoins on the Vice President the duties of President, in case of a failure in the Electoral body to succeed in an election, in the first place, or of a refusal on the part of this House to make one, in the second. To this provision it is objected, that a person not contemplated as President may be raised to that high station, because the person voted for as Vice President, by the Electors, may become the President. But how is this position to be reconciled to the fact that the Electors will give their votes under the knowledge that, in this very contingency, the person whom they select for Vice President will be the President, and that in case of the death, resignation, or removal from office of the President, (cases much more likely to occur than that contemplated by this provision,) the Vice President will succeed to his functions. How therefore can it be pretended that the man not intended to be President may succeed to the office, when it is explicitly understood that he may, and will succeed to it, under certain contingencies?

But another objection is taken. It is said that the Electors may fail not only to elect a President, but a Vice President also; in which case, if this House should not elect a President, out of those voted for to fill that office, the Senate will virtually have the election of President, because the Vice President elected by them will exercise the office of President: in which case the rights of the people, and of this body, will be transferred to the other branch of the Legislature?

I scarcely expected this objection, sir, from those who contend that the amendment under discussion narrows the influence and power of the smaller States. I shall not altogether rely on the extreme improbability of such an event, although it appears to me that it is as likely that the Senate, in such a state of things, should fail to elect a Vice President as that we should fail to elect a President. Remote as such an event is, for it depends on a failure of the election either of President or Vice President by the Electors, in the first instance, (a circumstance extremely improbable when a designation takes place,) and afterwards, on a refusal on our part to make a choice, out of those offered for our selection,—I shall not dwell upon its being a case barely possible, but will ask whether the right of this House to make an election can be abandoned but with its own consent? but upon a refusal on its part to exercise its right of choice? And how the power of the people can be said to be affected by such a transfer of the right of election from this House to the other, when it is notorious that in electing in that House the vote is taken by States, those of the greatest population and wealth having no more influence than the smallest? Is not the Senate as likely to prove a faithful organ of the will of the States as this House voting by States? In conceding this point, therefore, what do we give up? It is because the amendment contains the principle of designation; because in the first place the Electors must fail to elect a President; in the next place, they must fail to elect a Vice President; in the third place, this House must refuse to exercise their Constitutional right to choose a President out of those in nomination for that office; because all these events must concur before an election can devolve upon the Senate; and then they are restricted to a small number of those nominated for the Vice Presidency—persons, too, who will be selected by the Electors with a view to this contingency, because the wealth and population of the States have no more influence here in an election than they have in the Senate. It is for those reasons that I am in favor of the amendment. Even if this possibility of the election of a Chief Magistrate devolving on the Senate were more objectionable to me than it is, I would not sacrifice the discriminating principle contained in this resolution for a bare possibility. In case of a refusal however on the part of this House to make an election, will it not be better that the functions of President should be exercised even by a person nominated by the Electors and appointed by the Senate, than that there should be an interregnum, as gentlemen have chosen to style it? Are not the people as willing that such an officer should discharge those duties as that they should devolve upon a President pro tempore of the Senate, (a person who could never have been contemplated on his election to a seat in that body as succeeding to the Presidency,) who will necessarily act as President in case of the death, resignation, disability, or removal from office, both of President and Vice President—events equally probable, and in my opinion more so than that contemplated by this amendment? But perhaps I shall be told that this position is inconsistent with a doctrine advanced by me at the outset, that I should approve an abolition of the office of Vice President. But the sole condition on which I would consent to such an abolition would be an immediate re-election in case of a vacancy in the office of President. I never could assent to the exercise of those powers by a President pro tempore of the Senate longer than was absolutely necessary to make a new election by the people.

Having stated some of the reasons which will induce me to vote for the resolution on your table, permit me, sir, to reply to some of the observations which have fallen from the gentlemen from North Carolina and Connecticut. The first of these gentlemen (Mr. PURVIANCE) is of opinion, that the small States would never have come into the Union if the Constitution had originally stood as it is now proposed to amend it. A plain answer offers itself to this remark. If the small States are as hostile to this amendment as the gentleman supposes, they have only to put their veto upon it. The dissent of five States destroys it. If so little judgment has been displayed by the friends of this measure as to insure opposition from all the States except those five States which the gentleman styles large States, in contradistinction from the other twelve, which he denominates small States, it was scarcely worth the trouble of the gentleman and his friends to make so vigorous an opposition to it. But it is because I do not believe the resolution to be so drafted as to insure opposition from the smaller States; because I judge of the temper of those States as well by the approbation which three-fourths of the Senate have given it as by that which has been expressed in the course of this discussion from various quarters, that I am anxious for its adoption. The gentleman says that we had as well alter the ratio of representation from thirty-three thousand to five hundred thousand, and thereby deprive the smaller States of any vote on this floor. Surely the gentleman does not mean to say either that Congress have not the power to enlarge the ratio of representation, or that such increase would be injurious to the smaller States. The gentleman has expressed too great an attachment to the Constitution not to be well acquainted with it. He must know that each State is entitled by it to at least one Representative on this floor, and that by an increase of the ratio of representation, the number of Representatives might be reduced to that of the States, and the influence of the largest be only co-extensive with that of the smallest member of the Union; and this was a well known objection urged to the adoption of the Constitution. But at last the gentleman from North Carolina candidly confesses that he is averse to any alteration of the Constitution whatsoever. One of my greatest objections to the Constitution is the difficulty of obtaining desirable amendments, which increases with the increasing number of the States. Thinking differently from the gentleman on this point, he cannot be surprised at my acting differently. But he has surely little cause of alarm when he recollects that we possess merely the initiative in this business, and that the assent of three-fourths of the State Legislatures is necessary to give validity to what we shall do. I consider this as an answer to the charge of precipitancy, thrown out by the gentleman from Connecticut, even if it were not fully answered by the history of this amendment. One of the same nature had passed that House during the present and the preceding session. It had been the theme of conversation and discussion, both in and out of doors; and now we are charged with precipitancy, although the resolution had to pass through the ordeal of three-fourths of the States. But a more serious charge is brought against this amendment. It is denounced as opening an endless source of venality and intrigue. But to my mind the present system is more favorable to such mischiefs, and it is because I regard it as the death-blow to all intrigue; because I do not wish chance to preside where there ought to be choice; because I want no blind ballot, under cover of which intrigue or corruption may take shelter, that I advocate the resolution before you. From the manner in which some gentlemen have expressed themselves on this subject, it would appear that they had had personal knowledge of some such agency heretofore. Whether such enginery has been brought into action I cannot undertake to affirm; on this subject I am totally in the dark, nor do I wish to be enlightened.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

Much too has been said of the spirit of party, exhibited on this occasion, and on what is due to decorum on so solemn a subject. We ought not, we are told, to touch the Constitution under the irritation produced by the struggle of contending factions. Most sincerely, sir, do I wish that the American public could have been spectators of this whole transaction, or even that every word and every act which has passed within these walls on this day could go forth to the world. I am aware that this is impossible. But were it otherwise, I would willingly trust the issue of this question to the decision which should be given to the other. I would fearlessly leave the public mind to decide from what quarter party spirit and irritation have been manifested; by whom that conduct has been pursued which is calculated to reduce this House from the station which we ought to hold, and to lessen us in the eyes of the nation.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD.—The gentleman from Virginia cannot expect us at this late hour to go into a discussion of the merits of this important question. He has himself cautiously avoided going extensively into them. Instead of showing us that the amendment is not incompatible with the spirit of the Confederacy, he has contented himself with stating that though he objects to one part of it, it contains one principle to which he is friendly, and therefore he will vote for it. Without assigning his reasons, he simply says he will vote for it. Whatever gentlemen may profess, they cannot expect us at this late hour to go into a fundamental view of the principles this amendment contains. I therefore repeat the motion to adjourn, that we may to-morrow have the opportunity of discussing the merits of a question so important to the interests of the States.

The question was immediately taken on adjourning and lost—ayes 47, noes 75.

Mr. ELLIOT.—As an adjournment has been denied, it would not be considered as out of order, even at this late hour, to answer the elaborate speech of the gentleman from Virginia. I rise however to answer only one part of it. I wish, with the gentleman from Virginia, that a correct view of the whole proceedings of this day may go to the public, that they may be enabled to judge whether there has not been manifested, during the course of this business, rash precipitancy, indecorum, and party irritation. With the gentleman from Virginia I am totally in the dark as to any intrigue heretofore exercised. That gentleman says, from certain circumstances, he is induced to believe some persons know of some such intrigue. This I conceive to be an attack on the minority which ought not to pass unnoticed. How far it is correct to impute such motives to gentlemen entitled—if not by the brilliancy of their genius, yet by the public suffrage—to the same degree of respect with himself, I will not undertake to say. It is no privilege of a Representative to say, I believe you a corrupt, intriguing—

Mr. J. RANDOLPH wished the SPEAKER to decide whether he had said any such thing.

Mr. ELLIOT.—Such was my understanding of the gentleman's expression; the allusion was of a peculiar nature, and might be intended to impeach the motives of men of different political opinion from himself, or to impeach the motives of one or two members who generally agree with him. I know not his view in making the observation; but if the proceedings of this day shall correctly go to the public, I shall be much mistaken if they will not be of opinion that there has been more indecorous language in the speeches of that gentleman than in all the others put together. I hope the language and conduct of gentlemen on this day may be recorded; I hope this will become a subject of investigation with the people; and I hope that posterity will have no occasion to impute to them party spirit, rash precipitancy, indecorum, or anything else, that tends to lessen the respect which it is my sincere wish that the measures of this House should always command. I fear much, however, that the proceedings exhibited to-day will constitute a scene on which posterity will not delight to dwell, that they will wish it blotted from the annals of history, and that gentlemen themselves will, in the cool moments of reflection, regret that it ever existed. With one more remark I shall close what I have to say. If in the course of this debate any imputation has been aimed at my moral or political integrity, or if any hereafter shall be made from any quarter, however clothed in the language of brilliancy or decorated with the flowers of genius, I shall on all occasions meet it with contempt. I feel bold in the conscious purity of my motives, and I believe that the people I represent will never charge me with corruption or intrigue.

On motion of Mr. SMILE the House adjourned about nine o'clock.—Ayes 65.

THURSDAY, December 8.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, on a resolution referred to them touching the expediency of discontinuing the office of Commissioner of Loans in the several States, made a report, with a concluding resolution, that it is inexpedient to discontinue said office.

The report, with accompanying documents from the Secretary of the Treasury, was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate governments, was read twice, and committed to Mr. LUCAS, Mr. MORROW, Mr. CHITTENDEN, Mr. LYON, and Mr. CLAGGETT.

A memorial of sundry sugar refiners, citizens of, and residents in, the State of Pennsylvania, was presented to the House and read, stating certain inconveniences and losses to which the memorialists have been, and are now, subjected, in consequence of a construction given at the Treasury Department to an act passed the sixth of April, one thousand eight hundred and two, entitled "An act to repeal the internal taxes," in the case of duties accruing on sugars refined within the United States prior to the first day of July, in the same year, which were not delivered from the refineries until after that period; and praying that Congress will take the premises into consideration, and grant such relief therein as to their wisdom shall seem meet.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the question which was depending yesterday at the time of adjournment, "that the House do now agree to the resolution of the Senate, in the form of a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, proposing an article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, respecting future elections of President and Vice President."

Mr. GREGG.—Entertaining the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment to the Constitution now on your table had been already sufficiently discussed, I did hope that the question on its final passage would have been decided yesterday. I thought the minority could have no just cause of complaint that they had not been heard, and I believe the people of the United States will concur with me in this sentiment, when they attend to the lengthy speeches on the subject, with which the newspapers have been filled for several weeks. The great anxiety of the majority, discovered by their loud and repeated calls for the question, convinced me that they also were fully satisfied with what had been said, and were willing to rest the decision on the discussion that had taken place. It appeared, however, that one gentleman of the majority entertained a different opinion. At a late hour last night he again entered the field of discussion, and delivered his sentiments at considerable length. A decent respect for the minority requires that they should be heard in reply. I shall now attend with patience to gentlemen on both sides; and, although I had intended to take no part in the debate, I shall ask the indulgence of the House while I briefly state the reasons that will influence my vote, and notice the most prominent objections that have been urged by gentlemen in the opposition.

I am willing to acknowledge, Mr. Speaker, that the Constitution far surpasses in excellence, nay, that it is infinitely superior to the constitution of another country, that has been styled "the most stupendous monument of human wisdom." I believe it to be the best that now is, or perhaps that ever was, in the world. The names of those sages, to whose wisdom and patriotism we are indebted for it, will, I trust, be always recollected by the American people with gratitude and pleasure. But, sir, it is a Constitution of experiment. The wise framers of it, with all their sagacity, could not foresee how far its various provisions would, in practice, correspond with their views, or answer their expectations. It looked fair in theory, but its real excellence was to be tested by experience, and, therefore, a provision was inserted for introducing amendments, when experience should prove the propriety of adopting them. This, it must be acknowledged, is an admirable provision, and also a convincing evidence of the candor of the Convention. Conscious of their own fallibility as men, they did not, as some have since done, proclaim the Constitution to be perfect. They foresaw that experience might discover imperfections, and, therefore, they inserted the fifth article, declaring that "the Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution; or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution," &c.

The article respecting the election of President and Vice President, I have understood, was suddenly adopted by the Convention. A variety of modes of choosing the Chief Magistrate had been suggested, none of which received the approbation of a majority. Fatigued with the subject, all parties united in support of the mode contained in the article as it now stands, which was not proposed until all the other plans had been rejected. Plausible, however, as it appears, and supported, as it has been, by the opinions of very eminent men, it is on experience found to be imperfect. The result of the last election evinces this beyond the possibility of a doubt. Had the discriminating principle now contended for been at that time in the Constitution, could the Electors have designated on their ballots who they voted for as President and who as Vice President, no person will pretend to say they would not have made a President, and by that means saved the country from that anxious solicitude, from those distressing fears and alarms which were excited by the uncertainty and delay which attended that election in the House of Representatives. This single experience appears to me superior to a volume of abstract reasoning on the subject. It is, in my view, an unanswerable argument in favor of the amendment.

Another reason in support of the amendment, which has great weight with me, is, the public sentiment being so long and so loudly expressed in its favor. Several years have elapsed since it was first brought into view. It originated in the East; it has been echoed from the South, and the people of the West are also calling for its adoption. It has been advocated in turns by men of all political parties. A federal member from the federal State of New Hampshire, if I recollect right, first introduced it into Congress. A proposition, the same in substance, was afterwards renewed by a federal member from the then federal State of South Carolina. In the two last instances it has been brought forward by republican members, from republican States—first, by one of my colleagues from Pennsylvania, a republican State, and, during the present session, by a gentleman from Virginia, which is said to be also republican. New York, Vermont, Tennessee, Ohio, and, I believe, Kentucky, have, by their Legislatures, expressed their approbation of the measure, and invited its adoption. Federalists and Republicans, in every part of the country, thus uniting in recommending the measure, is conclusive evidence that a majority of the people, however they may differ on other political questions, are in favor of the leading principle contained in the amendment. This circumstance led me to conclude that it would have received but little opposition in this House. The members from those States that had been most forward in recommending it, I did expect would have given it their unanimous support.

To obtain such an amendment as would confine itself to the principle of discrimination, was the only object I had originally in view. That principle I consider as of the first importance. It would, I think, be sufficient to guard against the inconvenience attending the present mode of election. If the Electors are authorized to designate on their ballots who they vote for as President and who as Vice President, there is little danger of their failing to make an election, while the country continues to be divided, as it is at present, into two great political parties. I would even now prefer a proposition embracing that single principle to the amendment on the table, not only because I think it adequate to the attainment of the object in view, but, also, because I believe, in that form, it would be most likely to receive the sanction of the States. There is, I acknowledge, one feature in it, as it now stands, which recommends it to my approbation, and gives it, in my opinion, a decided preference to the proposition which went from this House to the Senate. In the event of the Electors not making a President, the House of Representatives were, by our proposition, restricted in their choice to the five highest on the list of the persons voted for as President, provided no one had a majority. By the amendment on the table, they are confined to the three highest on the list. I prefer the number three before five, because it evidently brings the choice nearer to the will of a majority of the people. This was so fully discussed, and so clearly elucidated on a former occasion, that it would be an unpardonable trespass on the patience of the House to dilate further on it at this time.

But the most objectionable part of this amendment, in the opinion of many gentlemen, and against which the gentleman from Vermont, in particular, has levelled his keenest darts, is that which vests the Vice President with power to discharge the duties of President, in the event of a President not being elected. The passage stands thus: "And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve on them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President," &c.

It is acknowledged that, at first view, the principle contained in this provision appears liable to objections, but it must be admitted that much may be urged in its defence; nay, I will even go so far as to say, that on a fair and candid investigation, the objections will lose their weight, and the principle be found not to be incorrect, considering the bearing it may eventually have on the people, on the Electors, and on the House of Representatives, in making a President. Let us, sir, for a moment, examine the probable tendency of the principle. The possibility, or if you will, the probability, of the Vice President being placed in the Presidential chair, through the obstinacy or neglect of the House of Representatives to make an election, may have a powerful influence over the Electors, and produce a concentration of their votes in favor of one candidate. The same consideration may operate as a considerable excitement to the people, to be careful in their selection of characters as candidates for the office of Vice President. The additional chance now given of his being called to discharge the duties of President, will determine their choice in favor of such men as are entitled to their esteem and confidence, next to the persons whom they may nominate for President. It will also operate as a stimulus to the House of Representatives to make an election. They will not be likely through obstinacy to suffer themselves to be divested of the power of making a President, when that power constitutionally devolves upon them. They will be very reluctant to yield it to the Senate. Their immediate responsibility will not permit them either to refuse or neglect making a choice. They will consider themselves more immediately the organ of the public will, even for the purpose of election, than the Senate. They are so. The long period for which the Senators are appointed, clearly justifies this position. But without resorting to arguments, I will elucidate it by an example taken from the State in which I live, (Pennsylvania.) At the late election for President, the members of the House of Representatives from that State gave a vote for the present Chief Magistrate. Had the vote been given by the Senators of the State, there is no doubt it would have been different. The question then was, who speaks the voice of the people? Look to the result for an answer. As soon as the Constitutional period expired for which their Senators had been appointed, they supplied their places by successors, whose political opinions they supposed to be in coincidence with those of their members who composed the majority at the Presidential election.

But there is one provision in this part of the amendment which is certainly of very considerable importance. As I have several times observed, I again repeat, I do not think the Electors will be likely to fail in making an election. Should they, however, not agree, I cannot conceive that the House of Representatives will be so lost to a sense of duty, as either to refuse, or neglect complying with their Constitutional obligations. But should an election fail there also, we will have by this provision a person Constitutionally vested with Presidential power, until a President is elected. Surely it is better to have a Constitutional officer to discharge these important functions, (and that officer chosen too in the first instance, with an eye to such contingency, infinitely preferable,) than to suffer the office to become vacant, and thereby expose ourselves to all the evils incident to such a state of things, as would be unavoidably produced thereby. I could have wished that this provision had extended further, and directed the vacancy to be supplied by an extraordinary election within one year from the commencement of such vacancy. But as it is providing for a remote contingency, one which may not, and I hope will not happen in a century, I think we may trust it as it is. As the Constitution now stands, "In case of the removal of the President from office, or his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice President."—Art. 2, sec. 1. This is only adding one other possible, and barely possible, for it is not a probable case of vacancy of that office, and it is securing against all the dangers and confusion to be dreaded from an interregnum.

The objections that have been raised to the amendment generally, I think, all resolve themselves into two. First, the danger of innovating on the Constitution, and, second, the jeopardy in which the small States will be placed by its adoption.

I perfectly accord in sentiment with gentlemen in all their remarks respecting the great caution to be observed in touching the Constitution. No abstract, theoretic reasoning could induce me to alter it in many of its parts; but when on experience it is found to be defective, as in the case in the present instance, I think we are bound to exercise our Constitutional privilege in obviating that defect.

With respect to the objections drawn from the danger to which the small States are to be exposed if the amendment prevails, I confess, Mr. Speaker, my mind is not capable to comprehend their force. From whence do gentlemen derive those fears and alarms with which they endeavor to persuade us their minds are so distressed? Do they know, or have they ever heard of the large States forming combinations against the interest of the small ones? I live in a large State, and I declare I never heard such a thing even hinted. Such an idea, I am persuaded, would receive no currency in that State. Such a combination is unnatural—it cannot obtain.

Should local considerations ever have any influence on the election of our Chief Magistrate, that period I believe is far distant. While the country is divided into two great political parties, (and I believe it will long continue to be so divided,) each party will endeavor to select the most prominent character, whose political sentiments are in unison with their own, and place him in the Presidential chair, without any regard to local situation. His politics will be the criterion by which he will be judged, without any reference to his being an inhabitant of the Eastern, Middle, or Southern sections of the Union.

How far would the ambition of the small States extend? Look into the Constitution, and see what ample provision is there made for their security. In the Senate, a distinct and entire branch of the Legislature, they are placed on the same footing with the largest States. There, Rhode Island, which is but a ninth part of Massachusetts, has an equal vote with that large and populous State; there, Delaware is on equal ground with Pennsylvania, although it contains but little more than one-eighteenth part of her population. In this House, also, their weight is equal to that of the large States in the important election of President, when that power devolves upon the House. The Constitution declares, "that in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, each State having one vote." What greater powers, what more extensive privileges, can the small States desire? Do they expect the large States to surrender their independence, and bow at the shrine of their omnipotence? Sir, I live in a large State, and although as a Representative of it, I would spurn every idea of combining with other large States to injure the small ones, or to divest them of the Constitutional standing and influence which they possess in this Union, yet I hope I shall never be influenced by the alarms now attempted to be excited on their account, to surrender the rights secured to the large States by the same Constitution. Important as the federative principle is which pervades the Constitution—which links the States together in a common band—which places the small States on a level with the largest in the Senate, and in this House in the exercise of one of its most important functions—equally important, at least, is the democratic principle it contains, which secures to the people the right of choosing their public agents. To enable them to exercise this right with a greater probability of succeeding in making a choice, and thereby preventing the removal of it to a different set of Electors, is the main object of the amendment. It scarcely appears proper to dwell so much on a subject calculated to excite State jealousies.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

Should the large States, contrary to the ordinary and natural course of things, attempt to form such a combination as has been alluded to, I would ask how it is to be effected? They are separated from each other in their geographical situation by the intervention of the small States. There is no commercial connexion betwixt them, except what is confined to their maritime towns. Distant from each other, they differ considerably in their customs and manners. They can derive no possible advantage from breaking up the political standing of the small States, and therefore I am unable to discover any force in the objection that has been so much relied on respecting their danger. Should local considerations ever have influence in deciding this important business, and combinations be formed to effectuate that object, the combinations will be betwixt States that lie contiguous. There may be Eastern, Southern, and Middle associations. In such a state of things, which, however, is by no means probable, Pennsylvania might unite with New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland, but surely never with Virginia or Massachusetts.

Upon the whole, the objections to this measure do not appear to me to be by any means conclusive; and the arguments in its favor are of such weight as to satisfy me that the vote I shall give is in conformity with the Constitution, is sanctioned by the experience already had on this subject, and is in unison with the wishes of a great majority of the people in every part of the country.

Mr. EUSTIS considered the subject important, as it went to effect a considerable change in the existing provisions of the Constitution, in the mode of electing the Chief Magistrate; and also important, as it had long occupied the attention of the States and of the people. When, said Mr. E., I consider the resolution from the Senate, and compare it with that which passed this House, I find several marked differences. It contains three provisions. The first provides for a designation of the persons voted for as President and Vice President, which is a modification rather than a change of principle, and is in unison with the amendment sent from this House, and with the general sentiments of the people—perfectly so with the sentiments of the State I have the honor to represent. While on this point, it may be proper to state, that, when I some time since mentioned the instructions given by the Legislature of that State on this subject, I did it to show that the great principle of this amendment had been sought for by all parties in the United States. So far, then, as it embraces the discriminating principle, I am in favor of it. I find that the instructions alluded to leave some latitude with regard to the modification of the amendment, so as to conform it to the opinions of the two Houses.

I do not conceive that the amendment sent from this House effects any alteration in the essential features of the Constitution; for, when the Constitution provides that two persons shall be voted for, it follows that one must be voted for as President, and the other as Vice President, and the discriminating principle only tends to carry this view into effect. So far, this resolution meets my entire approbation.

The second provision of our amendment was, that this House should choose the President from the five highest on the list: by the resolution from the Senate the number five is struck out and three inserted, in my opinion unnecessarily. Has any serious inconvenience resulted from the practice under the existing rule in the Constitution, as to the number of persons from whom a choice shall be made? We have heard of none. The inconvenience experienced arose from another source. This provision, therefore, of the amendment, appears to me exceptionable on this account. It is also exceptionable on account of the language used, which appears to me not to partake of that precision which at present characterizes every part of the Constitution.

The third provision contained in this resolution is more objectionable than the second, because it is predicated on the presumption that the House of Representatives will refuse to make a choice, in case the election of a President is devolved on them. It goes, in my opinion, to provide for a contingency that will never happen.

I am inclined to think that the designating principle will remove every solid objection to the present provisions of the Constitution. I wish not to touch the principles of that instrument. Not changing its principles, I wish the election to remain as heretofore, with this sole difference, that the person voted for as President shall be designated by the Electors. I object also to this provision, as countenancing and inviting intrigue, and because it removes from the House of Representatives the responsibility under which they are placed by the Constitution. It appears to me, that in case two rival candidates are presented to the House for a choice, by means of the influence of the Vice President the election may be protracted till the fourth of March, or that, in other words, the Vice President will become President.

I am sensible that this is only a proposition made to the several States, and that it must be submitted to their decision before it becomes part of the Constitution. At the same time, I am convinced, that going forth as an act of this Government, it will have great influence with the State Legislatures. It ought, therefore, before it is submitted to them, to be so correct and explicit that the collected wisdom of the country may be presumed to adopt it.

I repeat it, the first part of this amendment—that which establishes the designating principle—is a desirable object. I am sorry that I am reduced to the alternative of taking other provisions to obtain this, or otherwise to lose it. I, however, yet entertain a hope of accommodation, and that gentlemen will suffer this principle, desired by the people, to go to them unencumbered. Under this hope, I move a recommitment of the resolution to the Committee of the whole House, and that it be made the order for Monday next, that we may, in the meantime, send a message to the Senate to desire them to answer our resolution. The Senate may be induced, by this step, to take up our resolution and recede from theirs, when they find that it is not agreeable to this House. If after this measure on our part they prove tenacious, and insist on their resolution, we shall then have to meet the question of agreeing to it in the whole, or of abandoning everything. I do not know whether I shall not be induced to vote for the whole resolution, when I am satisfied that a better could not be had. I do not perceive any reasonable objection to this course of procedure. I do not think a decision of this important subject should be precipitated. The resolution is certainly less perfect than its best friends could wish it; therefore, I think it proper to recommit it.

MR. LOWNDES.—It is with very great pleasure that I rise to second the motion of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EUSTIS,) because I believe if it is adopted it may be the means of preventing this House from precipitating itself into a dilemma in which it will not be very honorable for it to be placed. It is the practice of this House, in its ordinary business of legislation, to correct inaccuracies of expression when they are pointed out. Ought it then, sir, on so important an occasion as that of changing the Constitution, to pass a resolution replete with obscurity? Verbal criticisms are said to be unpleasant, and we have had enough of them. Suffice it to say, that gentlemen who press the passing of this resolution in the very form in which it came from the Senate, give it a very different meaning. It is, sir, with equal pleasure I heard the very handsome eulogium passed upon our Constitution by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who says he thinks it better than even the constitution of that country which has been termed the most stupendous monument of human wisdom. I hope, sir, that it is better; but the eulogium of the gentleman is, to me, an admonition to beware how I meddle with it. I think, sir, that the gentleman might have gone on and applied to our Constitution the observation of a celebrated writer upon that of England, that, "though in some of its parts its policy was 'not obvious, and did not strike the superficial observer, yet, when tested by practice and experience, was discovered to be founded in the greatest wisdom and ability.'" It is this feature of our Constitution which, above all others when examined into, is discovered to be founded in that wisdom and utility. Considering the Constitution was the deliberate result of the best talents and integrity of our country, exercised at a time when party spirit did not influence our Councils, I am unwilling to give into any alteration of it which is not dictated by an imperious necessity. I am unwilling, sir, to familiarize the public mind to innovations upon this compact. I am afraid, sir, that any alteration we may make, however unimportant it may appear to us, may lay the foundation and make necessary other alterations, and that the nice adjustment of the different interests of the States may finally be destroyed. What, sir, is the result of the attempt to make a single alteration in your Constitution? For this House, certainly, when it passed the resolution sent to the Senate, did not contemplate anything more than a designation of the persons voted for as President and Vice President; but the resolution now before us contains three distinct, specific, and independent alterations. If we vary the principle established by the Constitution for the election of our Chief Magistrate, and by that means diminish the influence of the small States in the choice of that officer, what security have we that at another time the combined principle upon which the people of the different States are represented in this House may not also be varied, and the influence of the State which I have the honor of representing, and others similarly situated, be lessened on this floor?

In the few observations which I have to submit to the House, I will endeavor to avoid a repetition of arguments which have been already advanced. The two leading objections made to the Constitution, as I understand them, and which are made the ground-work of the proposed alterations, are, that by the double ballot two persons may be returned to this House having an equal number of votes, and a majority of the votes of the Electors, and, in the event of this House not determining which of the two shall be the President, the peace and tranquillity of the country may be hazarded, and that the person not designated by the Electors for the President, may, by a concurrence of circumstances, be elevated to the Chair of State. Though the policy of a double ballot may not be obvious at first sight, from the best reflection I have been able to give the subject, I am of opinion that it is founded in wisdom, and the more I examine it, the more confirmed I am in the opinion. The uncertainty which of the two candidates will be the President, is to me a strong argument in favor of it, because it is calculated to render an access to the office of President, through the medium of cabal and intrigue, less practicable, and thereby diminishes the inducement, which would be held out by the proposed amendments, to a resort to those practices: the intrigues of a candidate, if successful at all, may result in his being only the Vice President, a situation certainly not calculated to inspire or satisfy the expectations of an ambitious man. The object of the Constitution is to produce the election of fit persons to be magistrates, and, compared with this great object, the elevation of a favorite character is of trifling importance. This country is not so destitute of talents that one man only can be found qualified for the office of President. I have no doubt that this country abounds with men eminently qualified. I have no doubt that every State in the Union can furnish men who would administer the Government advantageously. The uncertainty who will be the President, will impose upon the Electors the obligation of voting for none but men of high character, and, if they do their duty, no inconvenience can arise to the country. It is true that two persons may be returned to the House having an equal number of votes, and a majority of the votes of the Electors, but it is an event which I think it improbable will ever again occur. I think it much more likely that the elections will come into this House in consequence of no candidate having a majority of votes, than from the cause first stated. The men heretofore elected to the office of President, were conspicuous characters during the Revolution; it was their conduct during that period which acquired them the confidence and attachment of the people; they must ere long be off the stage of life. It appears to me that the time is not far distant when the elections will be much more likely to come into this House from the defect of any candidate having a majority of votes, than from the other cause; but, Mr. Speaker, suppose what has happened should again occur, and that two candidates with an equal number of votes should come into the House; it will then be the duty of the House to determine which of them shall be President. We then assume the character of Electors, we become Electors under the Constitution equally with the original Electors, and I do not see but that we should represent the wishes of the people as correctly; we are equally chosen by the people, and, in some of the States, more immediately than the original Electors. But I do not apprehend the mischief which some gentlemen have predicted from this occurrence. I trust that there will always be found more patriotism in this country, more of the spirit of conciliation, than would permit, by a pertinacious adherence to a favorite candidate, to endanger the peace of the country. The person not designed by the Electors may indeed be the President; but if the Electors do their duty, and vote for none but men of high character, no injury can result to the country. Establish the discriminating principle, and the Electors, calculating upon the durability of human life, will, in their choice of Vice President, be influenced by considerations by which they ought not to be governed. They will select some popular man for qualities other than those which would fit him for the station of President. They will say he is a good man—he can preside with credit in the Senate. But he may be called to the exercise of higher duties, and the country exposed to all the evils of a weak and inefficient Administration. As the Constitution now stands, it may indeed happen that the person not designed by the Electors may indeed be the President, but I think it very improbable. But if this resolution is adopted and becomes a part of the Constitution, it appears to me inevitable, that the person designed for the Vice President will be the President, and that under circumstances of very great disadvantage. The resolution goes to defeat the very object which has been stated as the ground of an alteration in the Constitution. It says, “and if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, in the case of death or Constitutional disability of the President.”

This part of the resolution, Mr. Speaker, I think fraught with the greatest mischief to this country. We alter our Constitution to prevent, among others reasons, the person from being President who was not intended by the Electors; and in the same resolution we prescribe, under circumstances much more likely to happen, that the Vice President shall act as President. But, sir, this is not all, you make it the interest of this Vice President to prevent an election taking place in this House. You allure him by the greatest temptation which can be held out, to exercise all the arts of intrigue, bribery, and corruption, to elevate himself, and the whole patronage of the Executive is made subservient to his success. I do not think that a person who comes into office through these means will ever make a good Magistrate. He will not be at liberty to pursue those measures which the good of the country may require and his own judgment dictate. I think it the worst of all possible provisions that can be made. There are other objections to this resolution, but, as they are of minor importance and have already been noticed, I shall forbear making any comments upon them. The gentleman from Virginia said that the difficulty of obtaining amendments to the Constitution had been made an objection to it, but this resolution departs from the language of the Constitution, and instead of the ratification of the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, requires that of three-fourths of the Legislatures of the several States to its adoption. In every point of view in which I have considered this resolution, it appears to me objectionable, nor can I see that necessity exists for any alteration which alone in my opinion can justify us in meddling with the Constitution.

Many gentlemen have disclaimed being influenced upon this occasion by party views or considerations. I am unwilling to impute such views to any gentleman, particularly those who disclaim them; but I think the House ought in justice to its own character to avoid even the appearance of its being actuated (when altering the Constitution) by improper motives, and taking up the subject at this time, when the election of a President is so near, does exhibit an appearance not very favorable. If it was for no other reason, I would wish this resolution deferred until the next Presidential election is over; it might then be taken up and acted upon without any imputation or appearance of its being designed to meet a particular case.

Mr. ELLIOT.—While the present subject is under discussion I shall not quit it until hurled from my seat by the hand of death. As to the doctrine of submitting to the will of a majority, when that majority itself is not ascertained, I must again consider myself as opposing a torrent which threatens the destruction of my country. I have listened with extreme pleasure to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EUSTIS.) To-day the terms Federal and Republican have been introduced into the debate. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. GREGG,) I am persuaded, in the privilege he exercised on this occasion, did not mean to use any improper terms. That gentleman has had the candor to say that one of the majority having risen in the debate it ought to be protracted till every member is heard. It is never my custom to adopt the language of admiration; panegyric is one thing, truth another. That the proposition now under consideration comes from a republican quarter cannot be doubted. I glory that the gentleman who made it is an eminent republican, who stood in the high places of danger when we, as the poet says, "were mewling and puking in our nurses' arms." I rejoice that we can take ground so high, assumed by one whose republicanism cannot be questioned. What objection can gentlemen have to recommit a most important proposition, and to postpone it for three or four days?

Is not this republican, to invite to cool reflection the agitated minds of the members of this House and of the people? If this is not republican, then what is? The object we have in view is most decidedly, most gloriously republican. What is that object? To support the dignity of the Representatives of the people. This I repeat, is gloriously republican. I am glad such an opportunity is presented to evince to the American people, the sincerity of our republican principles; those principles I will ever support, in imitation of the bright example of the Revolutionary patriot who has made this motion. I will die at my post, if necessary, to support them. Sometime since, after long and deliberate discussion, we passed a resolution which was some weeks ago sent to the Senate. There it seems to sleep the sleep of death. The Senate have not deigned to inform us, whether they have deigned to bestow on it a moment's attention. It has been superseded by a resolution to which I trust in God that the American people are not prepared to agree; by a resolution bearing on the face of it the most manifest want of precision and of haste, that I ever saw; and we are now told that it is disrespectful to inquire whether the Senate will or will not bestow the least attention. I have no wish to wander into the wide field of discussion; I wish only to make a few observations in favor of the reference. The object of the motion has been already stated. It has been stated that it comes from a republican quarter, from one who cannot be considered as a federal man, or as actuated by a desire to defeat the great object of the amendment. It may further be stated, that the prospect begins to brighten; the dark clouds which yesterday hovered over us have passed away. I have been assured by several republican members, that it is their sincere wish that this amendment should be altered before it is passed. I know of one republican member, from the republican State of Pennsylvania, (Mr. HOGG,) who desires an opportunity of introducing an amendment; such a one as, if adopted, may remove his objections to the resolution. This is a forcible argument in favor of a recommitment, and can only be answered by a recurrence to the principle of the omnipotence of a majority. Unless amended, I feel a strong presentiment that the resolution on the table will not obtain a Constitutional majority. I believe it will be rejected by republican men, on republican principles, as anti-republican, as tending to destroy the Constitution, and to introduce intrigue, venality, and corruption. I believe the great mass of the American people to be virtuous, but I believe there are bad men in both parties. I believe there are in both parties some men of aspiring and unprincipled genius, who, if advanced to the banks of the Rubicon, would not, as Cæsar did, pause for a moment. Believing that this motion comes from a republican quarter, that it will have a republican effect, by preserving our Republican Constitution, and being one who can never be in favor of anything not republican, I must support this motion, hoping there is that spirit of wisdom in the House that will insure its adoption.

Mr. GREGG.—I understand the gentleman as saying it would save time to send a message to the Senate to require an answer to our resolution. I did believe the gentleman too well versed in parliamentary proceedings to fall on this idea. I do not recollect such a proceeding ever to have occurred. Each House will undoubtedly act as they see proper.

After a few observations by several gentlemen on the propriety of sending a message to the Senate, as intimated by Mr. EUSTIS, the question was taken on the preliminary motion to recommit, and passed in the negative—ayes 49, noes 59.

Mr. GODDARD.—After what passed in the House yesterday, respecting the resolution on your table, and after the remarks which have fallen from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. GREGG,) I presume it will not be thought strange that gentlemen opposed to a concurrence with the Senate in the passage of this resolution, should express to the House their reasons for that opposition. I rise Mr. Speaker, to do this. Before I enter into a consideration of the merits of the resolution, let me notice a remark which fell from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the time had been when the adoption of the discriminating principle, in the choice of President and Vice President was, to use the gentleman's own expression, a federal measure. Now the gentleman considers it as a republican measure, using his own terms of distinction. But sir, if the time has been when it was a favorite measure of opposite parties, I will venture to say that the time never was, when the subject has been fully discussed, examined, and understood. Prior to the last Presidential election, and when I suppose the gentleman would consider this as a federal measure, a resolution containing the discriminating principle came from the Legislature of New Hampshire to that of Connecticut, of which at the time I was a member, and that Legislature, although in the language of the gentleman, it was a federal measure, rejected it, I believe unanimously. It was at that time opposed by those who chose to call themselves republicans. The subject was not then very fully discussed, and I believe was rejected rather from a repugnance to innovate upon the principles of our Constitution than from a full perception of all the beauties and advantages which belong to this feature in the Constitution. But, sir, ever since that time, the more the provisions of the Constitution, as it now stands, have been examined, the more beautiful, useful, and wise, do they appear, and the more reason have I had to be satisfied with the vote then given. Let the simple principle be stated, and almost any person, without much examination, would ask why shall not the Electors be permitted to distinguish by their votes which man is intended for the office of President, and which for Vice President? What good reason can be given? This measure is now said to be called for by the voice of the people; it has received the sanction of several State Legislatures, yet, as I have never seen any newspaper discussion of it, nor any debates of those Legislatures, I am inclined to believe, that it has been acted upon by first impressions only, and the alteration been considered as proper, without much inquiry into the motives which induced the framers of the Constitution to adopt its provision.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

Let me premise further, that I consider it as our duty to proceed with the same care, and examine with the same deliberation, as if the proposed amendment became, by our vote, a part of the Constitution. I state this, because I understood a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) on a former day, to advance a different doctrine. That gentleman considered us as only initiating a proposition, which could not become part of the Constitution until it shall be ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States. This is correct; but the inference drawn from it, that it is, therefore, unnecessary for us very seriously and carefully to consider it, before we give it the sanction of our votes, is not correct. The Constitution has here erected one of its most powerful barriers against innovating upon its principles. It must not only be agreed to by us, but two-thirds of both branches of Congress must concur in proposing amendments. If we adopt any other rule of conduct than that of giving to this proposition the most deliberate attention, it will be dangerous in the extreme. The Legislatures of some of the States call upon Congress to propose amendments. The Senate take up the subject and agree to it, because the States, and the people require it. It comes to us, under the confirmed influence of the vote of the Senate, and the Legislatures. We adopt it, because they recommend it; and we send it to the States, with accumulated credit. They adopt it because we recommend it. In this way, sir, it will, like the description which we have of fame, acquire strength by going. It is, therefore, our duty seriously to examine the merit of the amendment, and not give the sanction of Congress to an improper resolution, under an idea that, if it is wrong, the States themselves will reject it.

Received in this point of light, the resolution on your table assumes a very important aspect. It goes to change entirely a fundamental principle of that Constitution, under which, for more than fourteen years, the people of the United States have enjoyed unexampled national happiness and prosperity. It goes to change that Constitution in a part of all others the most delicate and dangerous, that which respects the choice of a Chief Magistrate, to whom is confided the whole Executive power of an extensive country.

I consider it as more dangerous to change the principles in the Constitution by which a Chief Magistrate is elected, than any other; and a mode once adopted, ought not to be altered until experience has proved to us its disadvantages. Gentlemen seem disposed to join in extolling the virtue, wisdom, and integrity of the sages and patriots who framed the Constitution. Why not then permit their work to remain untouched until we feel or clearly perceive the evils which it does, or may produce? The framers of the Constitution adopted the principle which we are about to explode, at a time when no party spirit prevailed on this subject; when they had no rival candidates in view to fill the office. They discarded the discriminating principle, which we are about to adopt, when all eyes were directed to and all hearts united in the man who was designed to become the first President of the United States under the Constitution. And nothing shows in a stronger point of light, how highly they valued the principle of election, by double ballot, contained in the Constitution, than that they were willing even to put at hazard the election of that man, rather than to lose a principle which was calculated to give future peace, tranquillity, and liberty to their country. We are now about to destroy this principle. Before we do this, let us pause and inquire, what are the evils to be feared under the Constitution, as it now is? What are the benefits to be gained by the alteration proposed? I say feared, because no evils have as yet been experienced. Gentlemen tell us that the Constitution as it now stands is calculated to promote intrigue, venality, and corruption, and that the amendment is to give a death-blow to these enemies of our repose and Republican institutions. If this be true, it is certainly a formidable objection to the Constitutional provision. But when gentlemen say this, they deal only in general terms. Why not condescend to tell us how the Constitution is calculated to produce these evils? Has it been shown to us, by experience, that such is its operation? If so, at what period of our Government has it done it? When did this intrigue, venality, and corruption show itself? At the first or second Presidential election? The thought will not be harbored for a moment. At the third? No one will pretend it. At the fourth? The friends of this amendment will not surely say that the present Chief Magistrate owes his election to intrigue, venality, or corruption. Reference has been often had to the last Presidential election for instruction on this subject. But what does that prove to us? Why, that two men, whom the friends of the present amendment chose to select, and recommended to the people of the United States, were elected; and that they now fill the very offices for which gentlemen themselves say they were intended. Experience then proves to us, not that any evil has actually occurred, but that there was a period when they dreaded an evil. And what was that evil? They feared that their own favorites might have been misplaced! On a review of our proceedings under the Constitution, it cannot be surely said, that experience has proved to us that the provisions of the Constitution as they now stand are pernicious. If experience does not furnish this evidence, are gentlemen capable of pointing out to us clearly how the Constitution is capable of producing the evils which they fear? I heard a supposition stated, that hereafter a party might arise in this country, hostile to a republican government, and favorable to introducing a monarchy, and that the Constitution must be amended to prevent this. To be able to prevent this is one of the very reasons why the Constitution ought not to be altered. If such a party should ever arise in this country, they will either be a majority or a minority. If a majority, the amendment to the Constitution now proposed to be adopted furnishes them with the ready means of designating their man, without competition or embarrassment, and elevating him to the Chief Magistracy. But suppose they are a minority? Leave the Constitution as it now is, and they will be compelled to have for their President one of two republican candidates, who shall be presented to them by a republican majority. The Constitution has therefore erected a most effectual barrier against the intrigue and corruption of any aspiring individual, who may be disposed to trample on the liberties of his country. But the moment you introduce the designating principle such an individual may proceed directly towards his object—set all his engines to work, and operate with effect, having no competitor and but a single object in view.

Suppose a proposition should be made to alter the Constitution, so as to elect one man President for life? Would not gentlemen startle at it? I think they would, and yet, in my view of the subject, the proposition on your table falls little short of doing it. The advantages which the designating principle holds out, will always be in favor of the present incumbent of office. When I say present incumbent, I would be understood to refer to the Chief Magistrate for the time being—at any time. Once elevated to that high station, and the double ballot being abolished, he will, by means of his extensive powers, and the patronage which he possesses, always have the means of exercising a species of indirect corruption, if he should be ever disposed to use them. Preserve the Constitution as it now is, and he will have little inducement improperly to exert himself to maintain his station, because he must always be uncertain whether he can operate to effect. I am therefore, clearly of opinion that the provisions of the Constitution as it was originally adopted, are wisely calculated to prevent intrigue and corruption; and that the amendment on your table, if substituted in lieu of those provisions, is calculated to open the door to those evils, and perpetuate the Executive power in the hands of a single man; and am therefore opposed to it.

I am not disposed, Mr. Speaker, to go at this time into arguments which have already been advanced, with much force, respecting the influence of this change upon the rights of great and small States—I can add nothing to their weight by a repetition. But I may be permitted again to call the attention of the House to the important and singular additions which the Senate have annexed to the discriminating principle. We sent a resolution to the Senate in which we declared that, in case no choice should be made by the Electors, a President should be chosen from the five persons highest on the list. The Senate have not adopted this, but sent down to us the number three. Without attending at this time to verbal criticism, or adverting to the extreme ambiguity of the sentence which contains the number or numbers of persons, or the classes of persons, out of which the House of Representatives are to choose, in case no election is made by the Electors; I will only say, that whether three in that sentence is made to refer to persons, or to classes of persons, highest on the list, it is, in either view, the most objectionable number which the Senate could have selected. I am not disposed to cultivate local feelings, or distinctions arising from geographical situations, but, sir, such is the extent of this country, such its diversity of interests, manners, and habits, that parties will rise up hereafter, influenced by such considerations. Look at the United States, and consider what may, and probably will be, the great sections of the Union most likely to be united in their views respecting a Chief Magistrate. The Eastern States will form one section, the Middle, another, the Southern a third, and the Western, a fourth. This last, from its great accessions and rapid increase, will soon be the most influential of the whole. Suppose each of these sections of the Union should set up their candidates for the offices of President and Vice President—from a disunion, no election is made—a choice devolves on the House of Representatives. By this resolution a choice must be made from the candidates presented by three of these sections of the Union, to the total exclusion of the fourth; and which that fourth will be, is not difficult to predict. The adoption of this part of the resolution is, on this account, extremely objectionable.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

But, sir, the Senate have in this resolution proposed to alter the Constitution in another important particular, and have varied essentially from the resolution which we sent to them. No less, in effect, than to take the choice from us, the immediate Representatives of the people, and assume it to themselves. And we are called upon to submit to this! I speak not now under the impression of State, or any other local feelings, but as the Representative of a free people. In case no choice is made by the Electors, the Constitution has confided that choice to the Representatives of the people, without even the concurrence of the Senate. By the resolution on your table, we surrender that power wholly, in certain events, to the Senate.

Having stated this objection on a former day, when that part of the resolution was under discussion, a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) in reply to my objection, gave two answers—One, which he considered as conclusive, was, that although the Senate, if this amendment becomes part of the Constitution, may elect a Vice President, who may become President of the United States for four years, yet that this could only happen upon a failure of the House of Representatives to do their duty, and make a choice. Did the gentleman, before he gave this answer, consider that the provision in this resolution, to which the objection is taken, is predicated wholly on the idea that the House of Representatives will fail to make a choice? The provision itself supposes that a case will happen, in which no choice will be made by the House of Representatives. It is introduced to guard against the evils which it is supposed may result from such an event; and is wholly idle and nugatory, unless we are to suppose that such a case may happen. Another answer which the gentleman gave to this objection, but which he did not consider as conclusive as the former, was, that in case an election should devolve on the House of Representatives, the vote must be taken by States; and he says that the Senate are peculiarly the Representatives of the States, and will be as faithful guardians of their rights on such an occasion as the members of this House.

Is this, sir, a reason for our resigning to that body a power which the Constitution has confided to us? It is true that the Senate, in performing this high duty, may act as wisely and with as much circumspection as the Representatives would, under the same circumstances.

But let it be recollected that they are chosen for a much longer period than the Representatives, and may not feel the same responsibility as they would. Besides, the Senate would not vote by States when electing their President, who may become the President. It is true, that all the States are equally represented in that body, but it does not follow that the vote would be taken, as in this House, by States. A member from a State may be absent; if present they may disagree in sentiment. That may happen in this House, it is true, where the Representatives from any State shall be equally divided. But the States here, being represented by much greater and generally unequal numbers, it is much less likely to happen. The election, therefore, in almost all its features, will be essentially changed, in case the amendment should prevail. And I believe the time has been when the people of this country would have startled at the idea of conferring on the Senate of the United States the power of giving them, in any event, a Chief Magistrate. But gentlemen say it is desirable to provide for the contingency of no choice being made, either by the Electors or the House of Representatives, that the United States may not be without a Chief Magistrate. Admit it. But why not provide for a new election immediately by Electors, and designate some officer of the Government to administer in the meantime? This is easily done, and would be much preferable to taking, for four years, such President as the Senate may give us.

As, therefore, I can see no necessity for resigning this power to the Senate, of giving to the United States a President in any event, I shall feel constrained to resist this insidious claim of theirs, by my vote against the resolution which they have sent us.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL.—When this resolution came from the Senate to this House, it was not my intention to have spoken on the subject. I had determined to vote in favor of it, and let the measure itself justify my conduct in so doing. But so much has been said on this floor with regard to the interests of small and large States, and the effect which it is insisted this resolution will have on the rights of the former, that I conceive it my duty, having the honor to represent (in part) one of those small States, to state some of the reasons that induce me to vote for the resolution, and to be of opinion that its adoption will not, in the manner contended for, infringe the rights of the small States, or diminish their relative weight in the General Government. I am, sir, of opinion that our Government was formed by the people of the United States, in their capacity as such, by their immediate representatives in the General Convention, and not by the several States convened in their State capacities. The words of the Constitution are: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union," &c., and not we, the United States, in our State capacity, which I presume would have been the language used had the framers of the Constitution intended to have formed a Government for the States united in their State capacities; and though the State interests, as such, are regarded in our Government and their sovereignties represented, whereby it may be considered as partaking in some degree of the federative principle, yet this will not prove our Constitution to be a Confederation of States, in the extent contended for in their State capacities; but only shows that the framers of the Constitution intended, by thus regarding the State rights and sovereignties as such, to qualify and limit the operations of the General Government with regard to the several State Governments and their respective interests and rights. The laws that are made by the General Government are binding on the people of the United States at large, and not on the State Governments; for though the State Governments are limited by, and bound not to violate the Constitution of the United States, yet they certainly cannot be controlled, or in any manner bound by the legislative acts of the General Government. This, I conceive, shows, in a very strong manner, that the Union is not a mere Confederation of States. And considering the subject in this view will not tend to produce a consolidation of the General Government so as to encroach upon the rights of the State sovereignties; for the operations of the General Government being felt by the people only in their individual capacities, the State Governments will not be affected thereby so as to infringe their powers or endanger their independence; provided the General Government, in exercising its legislative powers, keep within those bounds prescribed by the Constitution, and does not assume the right of legislating on subjects that properly belong to, and are cognizable by the respective State Governments. I will here observe, that the object of every free Government is to lay down a rule of conduct for the people who live under it, by the observance of which, their general welfare and happiness may be promoted. Whenever, therefore, the intentions of the people in framing their Government can be ascertained, I conceive it the duty of those who administer the Government to pursue those intentions as nearly as possible. I have always considered it to be the intention of the framers of the Constitution, and the true spirit of that instrument, that the Chief Magistrate shall be chosen by the people, through their Electors, and not by the States represented in this House; and that the provision for electing the President by the House of Representatives, in case no election should be made by the Electors, was intended to guard against an event that might happen, which, if unprovided for, would stop the operations of Government, and not as a mode of election that was desired by any portion of the Union, or contemplated to be introduced when it could be avoided. I conceive, therefore, such measures ought to be adopted as would prevent, as much as possible, the necessity of resorting to that mode of election. It is certainly of primary importance that the people should have that person to govern them that possesses their confidence in the highest degree. In him they will repose the protection of their rights and the security of their interests, and will acquiesce with the greatest readiness in the just measures he may pursue. It will, I presume, be admitted that in all free Governments the will of the majority must be considered for the purposes of Government as the will of the nation, and that it ought, therefore, to prevail, and control the will of the minority when opposed to it. This, I conceive, sir, is a fundamental principle in our Government. I am, therefore, of opinion that whatever part of our Constitution is found in its operations to contravene this principle ought to be altered, and so modified that the will of the majority of the people should be pursued. This, I conceive, sir, is the case with that part of the Constitution prescribing the mode of electing the President and Vice President now proposed to be amended; it puts it in the power of the minority to control the will of the majority, and elevate a man to the Presidential chair who did not receive a vote from the majority for that office. According to the present provision of the Constitution, two persons are voted for by the Electors for President and Vice President, without designating which of them is voted for as President and which as Vice President. Suppose the majority nominate two candidates, the one intended for President and the other for Vice President, and vote for them accordingly. It is well known that the Electors, who are presumed to express the will of the people, have in view at the time they vote which of these persons they intend shall be President and which Vice President, though they are not permitted so to designate them in voting. In this case the minority, by voting for the person intended by the majority to be the Vice President, and not voting for the person by them intended to be President, will contravene the intentions of the majority, and place in the Presidential chair a person not designed by the majority, or by one of them, for that office, nor in most cases agreeably to the minority, but preferred by them in consequence of not possessing in so high a degree the confidence of the majority as the person by them intended for President, and therefore most likely to favor the measures of the minority. And the person thus elected would, in all probability, become suspected by both parties, and possess the confidence of neither. Hence a very serious inconvenience would arise; the majority, being disappointed, would become dissatisfied, and the minority would not have the man of their choice, but one from whom they expect some favor, in consequence of having contributed to his elevation; and it is confidently believed the peace of the nation would, in such a case, be more endangered than if a person decidedly the choice of the minority as President had been elected to that office. To avoid these and many other inconveniences likely to arise from the present mode of electing the Chief Magistrate of the nation, I am decidedly of opinion that the Electors ought to designate by name the person they vote for as President and the person they vote for as Vice President. By this mode, a fair and unequivocal expression of the public will may be obtained, and will have its due weight—the man declared best qualified by the general voice of the nation to direct the Government, will by that voice be placed in the Presidential chair; he will be more likely than any other to give general satisfaction in conducting the affairs of State; and this will very much contribute to promote the general welfare and happiness of the people.

I will notice another reason here, which I have not heard mentioned, that in my view has considerable weight in proving the expediency of adopting the designating principle. I am of opinion the election of the Chief Magistrate of a nation ought not to be left in such uncertainty, that it would depend on a mere casualty or chance who should be the person chosen to that office. This is the case according to the present Constitutional provision for electing the President. A difference of opinion among the majority, with regard to the person who shall be Vice President, or a greater unanimity in their choice of a person as Vice President, than in that of President, may, contrary to the design of the Electors, by giving the person designed as Vice President the greatest number of electoral votes, (though all were given with the view of making him Vice President only,) operate to the exclusion from the Chair of State of the person intended by the majority, and also of the person wished for by the minority, to fill that place, and elevate to the First Magistracy a man who did not receive one electoral vote from either party with the design of putting in his hands the reins of Government. This I conceive, sir, is contrary to the representative principle in Government, which I understand to be, that the sense of the nation should be made known, by a fair and unequivocal expression of the public will, and when thus made known should govern. But it has been said that the minority ought to have some share in the Government, and have a chance of obtaining the man of their choice to fill the second office in Government, if they should not expect to succeed in electing him to the first, or at least, that they should have an opportunity of voting for that person as Chief Magistrate that might be their choice, of the two persons nominated by the majority, to fill the office of President and Vice President; and it is stated that the present mode of voting for those officers, without designation, is calculated to answer these purposes. I am, sir, of opinion the voice of the minority should be expressed, and fairly heard in Government, and that it should have its due weight consistent with the principles on which that Government is founded; but I am not willing that the minority should rule the nation, or have it in their power to defeat the will of the majority, as I conceive this would sap the very foundation of our Government; and the present mode of electing the President and Vice President, without designation, cannot strengthen the minority, or give them a share of the Administration of Government, in any other way than by enabling them to contravene the will of the majority. They have not thereby a fairer prospect of obtaining the person of their choice to fill the second office in our Government, than they have to fill the first; to succeed in their choice as to either, they must probably vote for those nominated by the majority; and the ultimate consequence is, that if they succeed, the majority must yield to their wishes; therefore, according to the present mode of election, the major part of the society have only the power of nominating, and it will, in most cases, rest with the minor part to make the election from such nomination. This I conceive, sir, does not accord with the general sense of the American nation in theory, and will not operate more to the general satisfaction in practice. But it is insisted the proposed amendment is calculated to infringe the rights of the small States, that they have certain advantages secured to them by the present provision of the Constitution, directing the Electors of President and Vice President to vote for two persons without designation; and in requiring the votes in the House of Representatives, for President, to be given by States, in case the event should bring the election into that House, and also, in that the President is to be chosen in such event from the five highest on the list of those voted for. These provisions are said to constitute a part of the original compact between the States, and it is insisted, that although this amendment preserves the right of voting by States in this House, yet it diminishes the chances of the election coming into this House, and changes the number of persons from whom the President is to be chosen in such an event, from the five highest on the list, to the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President; and thereby, it is pretended, affects the interest of the small States, as they will not so frequently have the opportunity of exercising the power of voting for President by States, should this amendment be adopted, as they otherwise would have had; and also in that they will be more limited in the number from whom the choice is to be made. These are the only arguments I have heard advanced on this part of the subject by the opposite side of the House, that appear to me to possess sufficient plausibility to merit the examination, and these it is confidently believed, upon a fair investigation, will not support the objections made to this amendment, on the ground of its affecting the interests of small States.

It is certainly true that our Constitution, in some of its features, partakes of the nature of a compact, bottomed on a compromise of powers and rights between the small and large States; and this compromise will be found to be confined chiefly to the share which the several States have in the National Legislature, and the consequent effect which that modification produces with regard to the number of Electors of President and Vice President to which each State is entitled, according to the provisions of the Constitution; but it will not follow, as a necessary consequence, that the right of voting by States in this House for President, (in the event of the choice being left to the House,) was considered as an advantage granted to the small States in order to induce them to come into the Union. I cannot be of opinion that this was considered, by the Convention who formed the Constitution, as an equivalent given to the small States for any rights or powers by them surrendered to the General Government. If the small States considered it so, they must have esteemed those rights and powers thus surrendered of very small importance indeed. For the event in which they could have the opportunity of exercising the right this mode of election secures to them (of voting by States,) is extremely uncertain, and might not occur once in a century. And though it has once happened, it is evident the small States did not in that case unite, nor did the interests of the large and small States seem to be taken into view as opposed to each other. But, sir, let me ask what real benefit can the small States expect to derive from this mode of election, more than the large States? Have they the power to bring the election into the House of Representatives at their pleasure? They have not. It is a mere casualty, in which the small States can have no more agency than the large States. But what interest have the small States in bringing the election into the House of Representatives if it were in their power? Is it very probable that in such an event, there would be a candidate from either of the small States on the list of those from whom this House would be authorized to choose the President? I presume it is not. But is it to be expected that the small States would in such an event combine, so as to succeed in electing a President in opposition to the large States? Would the small States to the east and northeast, unite with those to the south and west? This may be possible, but certainly it is not very probable. Their positions are remote from each other, and each neighboring on large States; their local interests are different, and they differ in politics as much from each other, at least, as they do from the large States. I am then, sir, inclined to conclude, that all the benefit the small States could expect to derive from the election of President coming into this House, would be only the opportunity of throwing their weight and influence, as each of them might feel disposed, into the electoral scales, in favor of such of the candidates from the large States as might be most agreeable to them. And this cannot be deemed such an interest as would induce the small States, at the least possible hazard of the national tranquillity, even to desire such an event. But, I am decidedly of opinion, it is the substantial interest of the small States that the election should be decided by the Electors, and not come into this House. It is their interest that the Government should be administered according to its genuine principles, that no jarring interests should so come into collision with each other, as to produce a convulsion in the nation or endanger the fate of the Union. So long as this is the case, so long will the small States and their respective rights be in perfect security; and if they ever should be in danger, it will be when the bonds of union between the States are broken asunder, and each left to protect its own interests. But I am of opinion the mode of voting by States is productive of advantages of a different kind from those contended for by the opponents to this amendment. It was probably intended to guard the interests of the small States in some degree, in case the event should happen of the election coming into this House, and not as an advantage to the small States, that would induce them to endeavor to bring about that event; it was intended as a wholesome rule in applying a remedy in the case of a possible evil, and not as a measure to invite that very evil that seems to have been dreaded. It was probably considered by the framers of the Constitution, that, in case the election came into the House of Representatives, unless the votes were taken by

States, the weight and influence of the large States would render them too powerful for the small, because the large States could, if disposed, more easily act in concert, and unite their powers and influence in order to effect their purpose, as there would be but few of them necessary to constitute a majority of votes in this House, and it would be more difficult for the small States, being more numerous, and of course their interests more variant, to combine so as to act in concert. To this may be added that the mode of voting by States is less liable to the inconveniences that might arise from voting per capita in so large a body as this is, on such an occasion, which would in some degree partake of the nature of a popular election. From this view of the subject, I conceive it will also result, that the framers of the Constitution in fixing on the five highest on the list of those voted for as President and Vice President, as the number of candidates from whom this House should choose the President, in case the event should render such a choice necessary, could not have intended thereby to confer any favor on the small States, more than they would have done by fixing on the two, three, or four highest on the list; as it has been shown that the small States could not be benefitted by the election being decided in this House. I am therefore decidedly of opinion, that the relative interests of the large and small States had no influence whatever in fixing the number five in the Constitution. But I conceive the number was adopted by the framers of the Constitution as the least exceptionable to the States in general, when connected with the present mode of voting for President and Vice President without designation. According to that mode of election, three persons might have each a majority of the votes of all the Electors, and if the whole number of votes be an equal number, (which will be the case at the next election,) four persons might divide the votes equally, each having within one of a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and this is a case that might have been considered as likely to take place, upon the supposition that two persons would be nominated and voted for by one political party, and two other persons by the opposite party; therefore, less than the four highest on the list could not with any reason have been adopted, from whom this House should choose the President in case no election was made by the Electors; and the framers of the Constitution thought it advisable to add one to this number, making it the five highest on the list, conceiving, in all probability, that this would have an effect to prevent an equality of electoral votes being given for different persons, and thereby be more likely to produce an election by the Electors. It must also be taken into view that from this number of candidates (five) both the President and Vice President are to be chosen, and on that ground might be considered as small a number as could reasonably have been fixed upon. Here, sir, I cannot help noticing a circumstance in this debate which presents to me a very singular aspect, and that is, that most of those who have opposed this amendment on the ground of its affecting the interests of the small States, are Representatives from large States. These would seem to become the protectors of the rights of the small States, as if they were not sufficiently tenacious of their own interests. Is this anxiety in those gentlemen, for the security of the small States and their rights, really serious, or is it intended to awaken the fears of the small States and alarm them, in order to defeat the proposed amendment? I trust the Representatives of small States will see their true interests, and will not be influenced by such measures. With regard to the verbal criticisms made on the manner in which this resolution is expressed, I deem it unnecessary to enter into any examination of them, except so far as they relate to the number of candidates from whom the President is to be chosen by this House, in case the event should render such a choice necessary. As the resolution was printed and laid on our tables, the words alluded to are, "from the persons having the highest number, not exceeding three, on the list," &c. In this, the word number, being singular, might occasion some doubt in the construction of this clause, whether the word three related to person as its antecedent, or was intended to relate to number; but as the words in this resolution as it came from the Senate, and as it is now considered under discussion, are, "from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list," &c., the word numbers being plural, the word three must relate to numbers as its antecedent, (with which it agrees,) not to persons; and the word numbers evidently means aggregate numbers, each number including all the votes given for one candidate, or for all the candidates that shall have an equal number of votes. Therefore, the "persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list," &c., will include all those persons whose names shall be on the three highest numbers on the list of those voted for as President, and may not exceed three persons; but in case of different candidates having an equality of votes, may be more than three, four, or five. Hence I conceive the difference between the three highest numbers, and the five highest persons on the list will not be very material, as there will seldom be more than five persons on the three highest numbers, and there may frequently be more than three persons; and as there are some members in this House who would prefer the five persons highest on the list, and others would prefer the three highest numbers, while some would prefer the two or three persons highest on the list, &c., I trust this will not be considered as a material objection, as it seems to come as nigh the wish of a majority of this House as any number that could be adopted. I should myself, sir, (as I had the honor of stating in this House on a former occasion,) prefer the two highest persons on the list of those voted for, &c., under certain modifications, in case of an equality of votes, to any other number, because it would confine the choice of President to such persons as should appear to have the strongest evidence of possessing the confidence of the people. But I do not consider the difference between two and three persons, or between three persons and three numbers, or between three numbers and five persons, of sufficient importance to induce me not to vote for either, in order to obtain the principal object of this amendment, that of designating the persons voted for as President and Vice President. I will only claim the further indulgence of the House while I make a very few remarks on the provisions in this resolution, by which the Vice President is to act as President, in case the House of Representatives shall not make a choice of President. I am free to declare that I would have been as well satisfied with the resolution had this provision not been annexed to it. But I cannot consider this as introducing a dangerous principle, or likely to produce any real inconvenience. It only provides who shall administer the Government in the event of the House of Representatives failing to elect a President, by which the election is brought into this House. The House must next fail to make a choice, before the fourth of March next following, and a Vice President must also have been elected before this provision can operate, so as to vest the Vice President with the reins of Government, which seems to be the event so much dreaded—but one which may not happen for ages. But it is said that this provision will have a tendency to introduce a scene of corruption into the House; that the friends of the Vice President will endeavor to prevent the election of the President in order that the Vice President may succeed to that office; that this will be effected by the promises of lucrative offices, of favors, &c., or in fact by bare corruption. This is indeed supposing the members of this House will become more degenerate than the mass of mankind. I should presume we might rely on their continuing to possess as much public virtue as is usual in public bodies, and if this be admitted, I conceive there can be no serious cause of apprehension from this provision. But the arguments advanced, if they prove anything, would prove too much; they would prove, with almost equal force, that you must not provide for a successor to the President in the cases of his death, resignation, or inability, lest the person appointed to succeed him should be induced to cause his assassination, or use other corrupt means to produce his removal from office, in order to open the way for himself to ascend the Presidential chair. But this would certainly be destroying the necessary and useful provisions of Government on a mere possibility, and it is trusted groundless fears, of their being abused.

The gentleman last up, (Mr. GODDARD,) has asked if any inconveniences had been experienced from the present provision in the Constitution for electing President and Vice President? To this inquiry I might answer, that if this part of the Constitution be evidently defective, and calculated to produce inconveniences in practice, and such as are of a very serious nature to society, it would be extremely impolitic to wait until we had experienced all the evil consequences that would arise from it before we attempted to make the necessary amendment. I should suppose we ought to apply the remedy as soon as we discovered the defect, and thereby prevent those evils that it might otherwise bring on society. But I may further answer that gentleman that, on a late occasion, well remembered by every gentleman in this House, a very serious inconvenience was experienced by the Union in consequence of the operations of that part of the Constitution now proposed to be amended. On this occasion the Legislative functions of the Government were suspended, and the aspect of affairs seemed to excite very serious apprehensions in the most delicate minds, with regard to the external peace of the nation; the feelings of the American people were wound up to the highest degree of sensibility; they felt indignant at the attempt so obstinately made to contravene their wishes, and deprive them of the person of their choice to direct the affairs of the nation; and the agitation of the public mind rose to such a height as seemed to threaten a general convulsion. In consequence of this event, the voice of the American people, from almost every quarter of the Union, has called for the amendment; the same sentiment has been expressed by the Legislatures of most of the States; and are not these the strongest evidence of the general wish of the nation? Will you then, sir, when the voice of united America seems to demand this amendment, refuse to comply with that demand? Will members of this House, on account of a mere verbal difference of phraseology, or an unimportant provision for a case not likely to occur in an age, refuse their assent to a measure embracing a principle necessary to secure the tranquillity of the Union? I trust they will not. I hope we shall in some degree yield up our preference for particular modes of expression, and our opposition to a provision of minor consideration, in order to unite in adopting, so far as respects us, this amendment, and in so doing, perform an act that will be agreeable to, and joyfully hailed by nine-tenths of the American people.

Mr. HOGG having declared himself in favor of the principle of designation, but adverse to the other provision of the resolution, moved to recommit it, for the purpose of obtaining the following amendment:

"For the term of one year; an extraordinary election of President and Vice President, shall be made by Electors, who shall be chosen in the same manner, and shall give their votes on the same day, as is directed by the Constitution in the case of a regular election of a President and Vice President; and in case of such extraordinary election, the votes shall be transmitted to the seat of Government, and the election ascertained and concluded in the same manner; and if no election shall be made by the House of Representatives, in the same manner as is provided by the Constitution in relation to the regular election of President and Vice President; and the person who shall be elected at such extraordinary election, shall be the President until the next Constitutional period of election."

The motion to recommit was lost—yeas 40, nays 63.

Mr. TAGGART.—Mr. Speaker, unaccustomed

as I am to parliamentary discussions, I feel a degree of diffidence and embarrassment to which many others are probably in a great measure strangers. I have no intention to enter into a lengthy discussion, or investigation of the resolution now before the House. But as I stand here in my place the Constitutional Representative of a section of the American people, perhaps equal in point of respectability to other sections represented on this floor, and as I suppose some of my constituents expect that I will, upon certain occasions, do something more than give a silent vote upon such questions as may from time to time come before the House, I request the indulgence of a patient hearing, whilst I offer two or three reasons for the vote I shall give upon the resolution under consideration. I have not the vanity to suppose that I shall be able, by anything I shall offer, to influence the members of this House to vote in a different manner from that in which they have already made up their minds. Probably no discussion which can now take place will alter so much as one single vote. I think it likely that the proposed alteration in the Constitution, comprised in the resolution now before us, will pass this House by the Constitutional majority, and I know not but it may be finally ratified by a sufficient number of State Legislatures to make a part of the Constitution of the United States. If this event should take place, I shall, nevertheless, feel a satisfaction in having done my duty, in endeavoring, though feebly and unsuccessfully, to arrest the progress of a spirit of innovation, which I fear (God grant that my fears may prove groundless!) will undermine, and finally destroy our national compact.

I have not heretofore been particularly hostile to what is called the mere designating principle. I have sometimes inquired within myself, what good reasons could be assigned why the Convention which framed the Constitution left that article in its present form? It never having been a subject of investigation in the small circle of my acquaintance, I viewed it as a matter of but little consequence either one way or the other; and I am persuaded that, heretofore, this inattention to the merits of the question has been general in the part of the country to which I belong. But after seriously reflecting upon the subject, and attending to the discussions which have taken place in this House, both upon a former occasion and since the resolution was transmitted from the Senate, as well as listening occasionally to the debates in that body, I have received that evidence which, in the view of my mind, has more weight than a thousand metaphysical arguments, that the Constitution ought not to be meddled with. When I have beheld the many difficulties and perplexities attending every attempt to adjust the proposed alterations to the various bearings of the other parts of that instrument, I have been led to admire the wisdom and discernment of the framers, as well as to have a more realizing sense both of the difficulty and danger of innovating. Innovations in a national system, I humbly conceive, ought never to be admitted without the most imperious necessity. They are, at all times, a matter of hazardous experiment. But where is the imperious necessity in the present case? I trust it does not exist. If our national system is, in the main, a good one, though it may not in every particular completely meet the wishes of every individual, or even of every State in the Union, which, considering that it was formed upon a compromise, uniting a variety of different, and, some of them, clashing interests, was an event rather to be desired than expected, it ought to be like the law of the Medes and Persians, which altered not. But that it is, in general, a good one, we have had the most striking practical demonstration in its beneficial effects; in the almost unexampled national prosperity and advancement enjoyed under that system. In one respect I must be permitted to differ widely from an opinion advanced during the discussion of this question, by a gentleman from Virginia. I don't know that I should be correct in saying that he advanced it as his own opinion; I believe he rather spoke of it as the prevailing sentiment of particular sections of the Union, at the period in which the Constitution was adopted. The sentiment alluded to was, that the Constitution was objectionable on account of the difficulty of obtaining amendments. I believe, on the other hand, that the facility wherewith alterations may be proposed and obtained, is not one of the least of its imperfections. That provision of the State Constitution of Massachusetts, which, agreeably to the general sentiment and impression of the people, was at the time of its establishment, considered as an obstacle not easily surmounted in the way of its revisal, until after the term of fifteen years had elapsed, was, in my opinion, a wise one; though objected against by many at the time of its adoption, about six or seven years afterwards there was a peculiar season of ferment and irritation throughout a large portion of the Commonwealth. Had it not been for that provision in the Constitution, which threw an obstacle in the way of its revisal for a limited time, it is probable it would then have underwent some important alterations. This public sentiment happily subsided, and when the fifteen years elapsed, the period when the voice of the people was called for, to see whether they wished for a revisal, I do not recollect that there was found one town or corporation in the Commonwealth which manifested the desire of an alteration, in so much as a single article. At the end of another fifteen years, it is probable the public sentiment may be found still the same. Had as great, or even greater obstacles been thrown in the way of alterations in the Constitution of the United States, for the term of twenty years, instead of its being exposed to frequent alterations under the name of amendments, so much am I opposed to innovations in a national system, I could not have viewed it as less perfect. Upon this general principle I am at present opposed to any alteration whatsoever in the Constitution of the United States.

But further, Mr. Speaker, another reason which, as it is a point of delicacy to mention, I previously declare that I consider it as having reference to no individual but myself. I make no doubt but every gentleman on this floor can reconcile the part he takes in this business, with the utmost purity of intention. But so far as it respects myself the consideration of taking a solemn oath to support the Constitution of the United States is of considerable weight. I cannot see how I could act consistently in taking such an oath to day, and endeavoring to introduce an alteration in one of its important principles and provisions to-morrow.

It further appears to me, that should alterations in our national compact become really necessary, this House, or even both Houses of Congress, are the most improper of all places to originate them. That the Senate and House of Representatives have a jointly Constitutional right to originate amendments, is a point not to be contested. But in allusion to a remark which, upon another occasion, fell from a gentleman, who occupies a conspicuous station upon the floor of this House, that there were certain provisions or powers in the Constitution, which Congress never had exercised, and which probably there would be no occasion to exercise, and which he hoped never would be exercised; I am free to declare it as my opinion the power of originating amendments to the Constitution ought to be the last of all constitutional powers to put in practice. If any thing in the world approaches to a solecism in practice, it is a legislative body engaged in enlarging, altering, varying, or narrowing the sphere of their own powers.

I further observed, that, after hearing the subject discussed largely in this House, when it was first under consideration, and occasionally attending debates in the Senate, after patiently attending to the discussions on the different arrangements, adjustments, and modifications of the proposed amendment, which, as all are sensible, has proved a subject of no small difficulty; I could not but feel a degree of surprise to find that, in the course of such a lengthy discussion, not so much as one solitary argument should be advanced in support of the general principle of the resolution. It seemed to me as if the importance of the designating principle was, in the view of its advocates, one of those self-evident propositions which were in themselves so plain as to be incapable of any illustration by proofs. I am free to confess that I am not possessed of that intuitive knowledge which enables me to discover either the importance or correctness of the principle. Before I can vote for it I must have some sound, convincing argument in its favor.

It is true, some attempts of this kind have been made in an advanced stage of the discussion, first by a gentleman from Virginia, afterwards by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, and lastly by another gentleman from Tennessee. But, when I reflect upon the acknowledged talents of these gentlemen, I cannot but be affected with some degree of surprise that a measure of so much importance should be prosecuted with such a degree of zeal, while supported with such superficial arguments. My design is merely to state my own reasons for voting against the resolution, and not to answer arguments in favor of it. I shall only briefly mention one, which appears to be principally relied on, viz: that it is the voice or will of the people. I know not of a more equivocal phrase in the English language than this—"the voice or will of the people." Gentlemen, I presume, will not assert that the voice of the multitude, but too frequently formed upon a sudden impulse, and ever fluctuating, which is one thing to-day and another to-morrow; changing many times by the breath of some popular demagogue who is disposed to make this voice a hobby-horse to serve a turn, can furnish any solid basis, either for legislation or the formation of a national compact. But it is said that this voice has been expressed by the Constitutional organ, by the Legislatures of the several States, from time to time. We are referred back to New Hampshire and South Carolina, to New York and Vermont, to federal and republican States, and to the same State when federal and when republican. If the distinction between federal and republican is meant merely to discriminate the two great political parties into which the United States have been principally divided, it is acknowledged some terms must be used for that purpose. Whether this is the most proper I pretend not to say. I presume the term is not meant to convey an idea that those who choose to call themselves republicans are so exclusively, and that all others are opposed to a republican government. Such a distinction is better adapted to a discussion in a party newspaper than to the floor of this House. I give full faith and credit to that gentleman when he says he is a republican, and that the State of Pennsylvania which he represents is a republican State. But will the gentleman assert that the State of Massachusetts is not equally republican, and that the representatives of that State upon this floor are not republicans as well as those from Pennsylvania? No, I trust he will not. I am willing to go hand in hand with that gentleman in favor of real practical republicanism. I hope to live and to die under a republican Government. I know of no State in this Union which is not a republican State, nor any period of the Union in which they were otherwise; and I know of no member upon this floor who is any other than a republican, nor of any prevailing party in the United States opposed to a republican Government. But to return from this digression to the subject of public opinion. This, as expressed by Legislative acts, has been various. What it is at the present moment I pretend not to say. In some States I believe important changes have taken, and are gradually taking place. To say positively what it is in Massachusetts, I perhaps am incompetent. Many probably have never viewed the question in a serious point of light. I am far from supposing a majority in the State to be decidedly in favor of the designating principle. But, sir, the public opinion, when constantly and uniformly expressed, ought to have its due weight. There are other reasons which ought more especially to govern the decisions of public bodies. The question ought to be, rather, what will operate for the best good of the people, than what will strike the present full tide of public opinion, which perhaps before another year may be greatly, if not almost totally changed. I can therefore see no reason arising from this why I should vote in favor of the resolution.

But as I have as yet heard no arguments sufficiently forcible to evince the propriety of adopting the resolution, so there are still many good reasons for its rejection, at least they appear so to me. Here I shall not again travel over the ground of the clashing interests of great and small States when elections shall happen to be finally determined in the House of Representatives. Nor shall I inquire whether three, five, or twenty, are the most proper numbers of candidates from which to select the President. I believe that an election in any form by the House of Representatives is an event which will happen but very seldom. The larger States, by acting in concert, can always carry an election by the Electors. It will be for their interest to do it, and we are not to suppose that it is an interest which will be often overlooked. Whatever objections may be against the designating principle on account of its militating against small States when the election happens to be determined in the House of Representatives, I have a still stronger one admitting the determination to be made by the Electors, which will be an event more common, and that is, that whenever we adopt the discriminating principle, we will throw an influence almost unbounded into the hands of the President of the United States, which will in the end make him President for life. That extensive patronage which is necessarily attached to the Presidency of the United States, aided by twenty-five thousand dollars per annum—a sum which, with our growing wealth and population, will probably increase—joined to his influence in the army, navy, and militia, can scarcely fail to render his re-election at all times so certain as to be nothing more than form. I have not the most distant apprehensions that these consequences would be immediate. Probably this generation may not realize them in their fullest extent. But if the progress is slow, I apprehend it will be sure, and that we will hereby forge Presidential chains for posterity, it may be to the latest generation. I see no security that we have that a President of the United States may not, at one time or another, be ambitious, artful, and intriguing. The love of power is congenial to mankind; this desire seems to be interwoven with human nature. It grows with our growth, and strengthens with our strength. Is it not natural to expect that a President of the United States, unless he is such a prodigy of virtue and disinterestedness, as is not at all times to be expected to fill that important office, having once tasted the sweets of power as well as the emoluments of office, would wish to perpetuate it? We cannot but suppose that a judicious distribution of the places of honor and profit which he has in his gift will have a great tendency to secure his re-election, and if a little extra expense should be sometimes necessary in the view of an ambitious and unprincipled man, the importance of the object to be obtained will be sufficient to justify the means. I wish to entertain as high an opinion of the integrity and incorruptibility of every member of the Government as any gentleman on this floor. I wish not only that all the individuals attached to any branch of our Government, but that all our citizens were forever to remain so entirely incorruptible as to be totally uninfluenced by indirect means and motives. But is such a degree of public and private virtue to be expected in the existing state of things? It was a maxim of a wise statesman, one who had a very extensive knowledge of human nature, especially on the dark side, I mean the noted Sir Robert Walpole, Prime Minister of Great Britain during the first part of the reign of George the Second—"that every man had his price." Though I cannot suppose this observation true in its fullest extent, yet I believe its opposite is equally untrue, that is, that no man has his price. Truth, I believe, lies between the extremes. The same statesman further observed, "that patriots were like mushrooms. He could cause fifty of them to spring up in a night, and leave the world to judge by what means." Such patriots or friends to prerogative may spring up in our country. They may, at some future time, spring up on the floor of this House. Why then will we, by the adoption of the discriminating principle, lay such a temptation before a President by putting it into his power, with so much greater facility, to prolong and perpetuate his authority. It appears to me that the wisdom of man could scarcely adopt a more effectual check to ambitious views of that kind than the present mode of election, by a double ballot for two persons without discrimination. So long as elections are managed in this way, an ambitious man, as he must forever remain uncertain of carrying an election, even by securing all the Electors, unless he can secure the House of Representatives too, will be under comparatively small temptations to use any unfair means to accomplish that end. But adopt the designating principle, and according to the present ratio of population, his election is secured by eighty-nine votes.

Besides, as the Vice President will not stand on such high ground in the method proposed, as he does in the present mode of a double ballot, so it is probable so great care will not be taken in the selection of a character to fill that office. Not standing on such high ground, the probability is that he will take the more humble station of the mere tool of the President; and truly, if the designating principle be once introduced into the Constitution, I see not what end a Vice President can answer, unless it be to take a pleasant journey to the seat of Government once a year, meet with and preside in the Senate for a few weeks, possibly not more than three or four in a session, receive five thousand dollars, and go home again. This to be sure is a very pretty douceur, and if he can, by the by, lend a hand to bring forward the President's re-election, he may expect to be assisted in securing his own in return. Upon the whole, can it be thought necessary, in order to avoid a momentary inconvenience, such as was supposed to be experienced at the last Presidential election, and such as will rarely happen more than once in an age, if so often, to set aside an important principle in the Constitution, and thereby subject our country to inconveniences of a more serious nature?

If it be said that should these or any other serious inconveniences be experienced, the amendment may be dropped, or a new one introduced to guard against them. I reply in the words of the poet:

"*Facilis descensus Avernì sed revocare gradum,
"Hic labor, hoc opus."*

The descent is easy, but to retrace the step on an up-hill road, this is the arduous task, this the painful labor. But as I view the proposed alteration as needless in every respect, and as injuring instead of amending the Constitution of the United States, so I view the resolution which has come from the Senate as still much more exceptionable than the one which originated in this House. I agree with gentlemen who urge the propriety of paying a suitable deference to the opinions of the Senate, but as no member of this House is obliged to give the sanction of his vote to a measure merely because it is agreeable to the Senate, I think this House ought to pay some respect to their own opinions. To pay an implicit deference to a resolution of the Senate, which I have reason to suppose the majority of this House, so far from considering as superior, view as much more objectionable than their own, merely from its being a supposed expression of the opinion of the Senate, is a degree of deference which I can hardly suppose due from one Legislative body to another.

The resolution in its present form tends to plunge us completely back into all the difficulties apprehended from the Constitution as it now stands, which its advocates proposed to avoid by the adoption of the discriminating principle, by rendering it possible that we may have an acting President of the United States, who never was contemplated; and never had so much as one vote for the office; a man who in all probability will not have that dignity, independence, and respectability of character, which we would naturally expect would be found in one chosen by a joint ballot, with some probability of his becoming the President; and indeed, whenever an election of President shall come into the House of Representatives, there is the greatest probability of the Vice President's succeeding to that office. Supposing that officer to be previously elected, either by the Electors or by the Senate, and must succeed of course to the Presidency in case of the non-election of a President, as he would have strong temptations; so the nature of the resolution is calculated to invite intrigue, in order to defeat the election of a President; and although I have purposely guarded against running a comparison between large and small States, yet permit me to remark, that seven Representatives will be more likely to be tampered with than seventy-four, and as according to the present apportionment they would represent an equal number of States, they, when voting by States, would have an equal weight in either effecting or defeating a Presidential election. Upon the whole, as the amendment now proposed shields us from no difficulty, and may, and probably will, expose us to evils innumerable, whatever may be its fate, I feel an entire satisfaction that I shall do my duty in voting against it.

MR. HOLLAND.—I am not surprised, after hearing the declarations of the honorable, I might add the venerable, member from Massachusetts, (Mr. TAGGART,) that the resolution on your table proposing an amendment to the Constitution as it respects the election of President and Vice President, will not obtain his support. The venerable gentleman states that he has taken an oath to support the Constitution, and therefore infers that he is under sacred obligations not to admit the alteration or amendment, as it would violate his oath. If the venerable member had read a certain provision in the Constitution, he would have there found, that in cases of amendment, he would be completely absolved from the obligations of his oath.

The venerable member has also said that the reasons offered so far as respects the will of the people in favor of this amendment is entitled to little weight. That the will of the people is unstable, versatile, fluctuating, and not to be relied on. Sir, I am one of those who have been early taught to respect the will of the people, and notwithstanding what has been said, I still retain an opinion that the public will is of binding obligation, and I hope I shall continue to regard it. The Constitution itself is predicated upon the will of the people, and in order to ascertain this will at all times, the framers were obliged to resort to elections and delegations of power by which agents were to be appointed to express and execute their will, whether acting in a Legislative or Executive capacity. But the delegation of power ought to be imposed only in cases where the will of the people cannot be otherwise known. Under these impressions I have not admired the plan adopted in the Constitution of electing those high officers by Electors. I should have preferred an immediate suffrage to this indirect mode of electing by Electors; but as the framers of the Constitution have thought proper to ascertain the public will through the medium of Electors, I am unwilling that they also should be under any unnecessary trammels whereby the will of their constituents should be impeded.

The gentleman that I have alluded to has acknowledged that on his first reading the Constitution he did not discover the policy of confining the Electors to what he calls a double vote, but is now willing to suppose that it was intended for wise and good purposes. I must confess, sir, that I, who have labored under the same difficulty, have never understood the policy that dictated this provision. It was doubtless intended for the best of purposes. I am far from implicating the motives, but it appears to be an effort to conceal in midnight silence and secrecy the intent of the Electors as to the person intended to be President, and the person intended to be Vice President. If this was the intention of this provision, let me ask gentlemen if it has been effected? A recurrence to all the elections for President and Vice President since the commencement of the Government will solve this question, and fully demonstrate that the person intended by the Electors to fill each office was well understood and known to all the Electors, and to all other persons that wished to know the secret has not been kept; from which it follows that the end has not nor never will answer the original design? And for what purpose shall we continue it any longer?

This mode takes more of the nature of a lottery than an election; the Electors are compelled to put two persons' names in a box, deprived of the liberty of exercising their rationality as to the application of either person to any specific office, and must leave the event to blind fate, chance, or what is worse, to intrigue to give him a President. Experience has shown that difficulties have attended this mode, and that it has not answered the original intention, and it is easy to foresee that it may be so practised upon as to destroy the first principle of our Government, that of the will of the majority in their election of the Chief Magistrate. I will not say that there is a faction now existing that would wish to defeat the will of the majority. But I may be permitted to say that it is a possible and a probable case that such a faction may exist, and on the existence of such faction, how easy would it be for them, under the existing provisions of the Constitution, to defeat the public will. I have before said that the intention of the majority is known to all; the Electors compose a part of this faction, and knowing that the majority to fulfil their object will decline to give all their votes to the person intended by them for the second office, this minor faction will accomplish their design by giving all their suffrages to the person intended to fill the second office, and by this means contravene and totally defeat the will of the majority; and all this may be right and proper in the view of many gentlemen, but to me who regard the public will, it is exceedingly improper—to prevent which, I am in favor of the amendment. Nor do I conceive the force of the objection of my worthy friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERTS,) for whose opinions I entertain a high respect, to the amendment to our original resolution as made by the Senate, in reducing the number from which the President is to be chosen by the House of Representatives, when the choice devolves upon them, from five to three; and I hope, when he comes to reconsider his objections, that they will be found not to be solid, and that the amendment of the Senate is not an innovation of the principles of the Constitution, but more in unison with it than our original resolution. In the Constitution, when the election devolves upon the House of Representatives, the President and Vice President are to be taken from the five highest numbers on the list. In our original resolution the President alone was to be elected from the five highest numbers of those voted for as President, and the Vice President was to be elected from the two highest of those voted for as Vice President, augmenting the numbers from which those officers were to be chosen from five to seven. In the reduction of the Senate from five to three, from which the President is to be chosen, and the Vice President to be chosen from two other distinct numbers, makes precisely the same number out of which those officers are to be chosen as in the existing provisions of the Constitution.

In regard to the additional amendment providing in cases where the House of Representatives fails to elect a President, the whole objections are predicated upon a presumption that the House of Representatives and Senate have or will become so corrupt, that they will not regard the high duties attached to their stations.

Mr. Speaker, when the American Congress are thus contaminated, it will be an extreme case; against the evils of such a situation no remedy would avail you—all is gone. But this is only a possible case, and such a one that I will not suffer myself for a moment to apprehend, and therefore shall not attempt to guard against. And as I think that the resolution is calculated to avoid evils heretofore experienced in the election of our Chief Magistrate, and is consistent with the wish of the people, and will contribute to their happiness, it shall have my most cordial support.

Mr. THATCHER.—Mr. Speaker: My principal object in rising upon this occasion is, to examine some of those ideas which were suggested by gentlemen of the majority in the course of yesterday's debate. But, before I attempt that examination, I beg leave to call the attention of the House for a moment to a view of the subject, which has convinced my mind that the proposed amendment cannot be adopted without materially impairing the rights of individual States—without, in fact, destroying the very basis of the Confederacy.

Under the first confederation the States composing the Union were equal and independent. They voted by States. This Constitution was adopted by States, acting in their corporate capacity. They relinquished certain important rights, and the United States, by the Constitution, guaranteed to each State the enjoyment of other rights as an equivalent. The one was a consideration for the other. The States, for example, which held few or no slaves, consented to relinquish their right of equal representation in the House of Representatives; and that those States which possessed a vast number of slaves should be represented in Congress "according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons." The number of Electors of President and Vice President is increased in the same proportion. Among other things, in return, the Constitution establishes a mode of electing the President and Vice President which gives to each State a share in the election, and in determining the number of Electors it has express reference to States in their corporate capacity. By the article which it is proposed to alter, each State is entitled to "a number of Electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress." It provides that two persons shall be voted for, without designating which is intended for President. It further provides that "if there shall be more than one" (person) "who have a majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately choose, by ballot, one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then from the five highest on the list, the said House shall in like manner choose the President. But in choosing the President the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote," &c. By this important article of the Constitution a degree of influence in the choice of President and Vice President is in fact guaranteed to each State, and the large States consented that the small States should have a greater share of votes in the choice than they would have been entitled to by their population. It has been so clearly shown, indeed it is so evident, that the Constitutional mode of election is calculated to guard the rights and interests of each State, but most of all the small States, that I forbear to enlarge upon this point. It is certain that the larger States would not have guaranteed to the small, rights so important, rights which abridged their own power materially, unless they had received an equivalent. We cannot determine, with certainty, that one of these rights was solely a consideration for another, but it is sufficient for this argument to know that the rights guaranteed were a consideration for those relinquished. It follows, that although we may modify the forms of the Constitution, in such a manner as will operate equally upon all the States, we cannot, under the article providing for amendments, ingraft new principles into the Constitution which will destroy the rights of individual States, without the consent of those States. There are certain rights inherent in States, as well as in individuals, of which they can never be divested without an express consent. Suppose two-thirds of Congress and the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States should adopt a resolution which in direct terms should declare that in future other States should give no votes, or should have no share in the election of President and Vice President, would any one pretend that they were authorized to do this under the article providing for amendments of the Constitution? I consider it impossible to adopt a resolution which will impair the rights of sovereign States, which in fact will secure to the few States the power of choosing the President and Vice President at pleasure, to the total exclusion of all the other States, (and it has been clearly shown that with the present population five States may choose the President and Vice President, to the exclusion of the other twelve,) without making the Constitution a nudum pactum; without destroying the very basis of the Confederacy. I look forward, sir, with fearful apprehension to the consequences, should this resolution be adopted. It will create the greatest dissatisfaction in the States injured by the alteration. It will furnish arguments to the enemies of this Union, which may effect its destruction.

An honorable gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. CAMPBELL) has founded his argument principally upon the position that the proposed amendment will carry into effect the public will; that it will prevent a contingency, which, under the present mode of election may occur, viz: the person intended by a majority of the Electors for President may be supplanted by the person intended by them for Vice President, and will fill the second office in the Government. This argument has also been urged by other gentlemen.

It is scarcely within the compass of possibility that, with the experience already had, an equal number of votes, and a majority should be given to two candidates for the Presidency. But it is demonstrable that whenever the right of choosing a President shall, under this amendment, devolve upon the House of Representatives, the danger that the person intended by the Electors for President will be excluded, not only from the Presidency, but also from the Vice Presidency, will be increased in a tenfold ratio. For, under this amendment, as adopted by the Senate, the House of Representatives may choose the President not only from five candidates, as under the present mode, but from among the candidates who may have either of the three highest numbers. The number of candidates, therefore, is almost unlimited. Every State candidate, every ambitious man who can secure a few votes, will offer himself for the office, and knowing that his only chance of success will be in the House of Representatives, it will be the object of all his supporters to prevent a choice by the Electors. The Vice President will be impelled by the most powerful inducements to prevent a choice, because by this amendment, "if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the 'right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March then next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other Constitutional disability of the President.'" If the Vice President shall be elected by the Senate, the influence of the Senators may be added, to prevent a choice by the House, for they will naturally prefer that the man of their own choice should act as President. Thus, to the clashing interests of States, and of numerous candidates, may be added the influence of the Vice President and of the Senate, all tending to prevent a majority of States from uniting in one candidate. Under the present mode, if, by possibility, the choice should devolve upon the House of Representatives, the responsibility for all the evils of an interregnum must operate as the most powerful inducement to make an election; but, under this amendment, the horrors of anarchy will not be dreaded, because in case of no choice the Government will be administered by the Vice President. It is fairly to be calculated that no election will be made by the House of Representatives. What is the consequence? A man who, from the nature of the choice, will probably be unqualified for the office, (as has been very clearly shown by my friend from Connecticut,) a man who had not one vote for President, succeeds, in fact, to that office. Thus the choice may be virtually transferred from the popular to the federative branch of the Government.

The gentleman from Tennessee tells us that this argument, drawn from the omission of the House to elect a President, implies corruption. This cannot be admitted, for men will naturally disagree in their opinions of candidates, and may very honestly adhere to the dictates of their judgments and consciences. But, sir, if it did imply corruption, it would not destroy the force of the argument. With the growth and opulence of our country, we must expect corruption; with the progress of our Government we must calculate upon intrigue.

To prevent the difficulties and dangers of a contested election in the House of Representatives, we hold out by this amendment to the large States the strongest inducements, we almost compel them, by the principles of self-interest, so to combine that the right of choice shall not devolve upon the House of Representatives. As a few States may so combine as to secure to themselves the election of President and Vice President, to the total exclusion of the other States, the greatest evils are generally to be apprehended from such exclusive combinations.

What, let me ask, sir, are the evils, the great, the impending evils, which will induce us to brave all the dangers of this hazardous experiment? The worst that can be apprehended from the present mode of choice is, that two of the first citizens in the United States, each having a majority of votes—voted for by the same Electors—if it should happen that they have an equal number of votes, the one preferred by the majority of Electors for President may chance to fill the second office in the Government, while the candidate intended by a majority of the Electors for the second office, may, by the votes of a majority of States, be chosen President.

The gentleman from Tennessee conceives that the minority can have no share in the election but by counteracting the will of the majority. Let it be remembered, sir, that it requires a majority of the Electors to make a choice. All that is left to the minority, under the present mode of election, when they have any share in the choice, is, to vote for one of the candidates offered by the majority. Is there to be a line of demarkation drawn between the parties by the Constitution itself, which will render the Chief Magistrate of the Union the mere instrument of a party? Is this calculated to secure the equal rights of the minority?

Mr. Speaker, several gentlemen in the majority have told us that the people call for this "amendment." My colleague (Mr. TAGGART) has been accused of speaking disrespectfully of the people. I understood him simply to say, that public opinion is mutable, and that the opinion of the people respecting this "amendment" has not been ascertained. How, sir, do gentlemen know the opinion of the "people" upon this question? By what evidence does it appear? It is said, that some of the State Legislatures have expressed a wish in favor of the "amendment." I know that two or three Legislatures, at different times, have passed a vote in favor of the designating principle. But, sir, no State Legislature has ever expressed approbation of the various other alterations in this resolution.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H OF R.

If the State Legislatures had expressed their approbation of this resolution, will gentlemen say that it ought to be obligatory upon the members of this House? We certainly are under the strongest obligations to give an independent vote upon the question, controlled only by the dictates of our own consciences. The Constitution has, in this instance, made each House of Congress and the State Legislatures a check upon each other; else, why are two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, and the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, required by the Constitution to concur in an amendment? If the opposite doctrine be correct, it would have been better to have decided questions respecting Constitutional amendments by the State Legislatures alone, than to have assigned to Congress a part in such a political farce.

In the course of this debate, various and repeated allusions have been made to party distinctions. We have, I believe, for the first time in this House heard the terms federal and republican applied to members of this House, and contradistinguished to each other. I have long seen these distinctions in newspaper publications, but I feel great regret that they should be introduced here, more particularly upon a question which demands of us to divest ourselves of all partial considerations, and to investigate this subject with candor and with coolness. What can gentlemen intend to effect by this denunciation? Is it intended to cast a reproach upon the name of federalist? Do they recollect whence was derived the honorable distinction of federalist? Do they not know that it is derived from an early and warm attachment to the Federal Constitution? If gentlemen claim the title of republicans, let them not claim it exclusively. Let them remember that we are all bound by oath to support the same Federal Republican Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, my mind is deeply impressed with a sense of the vast importance of rejecting this resolution. We are not discussing an ordinary, a party, or a local question, but it is proposed to adopt a material change in a fundamental principle of the national compact; an alteration which will affect the whole Union, which will influence the condition of millions long after the present distinctions of party shall have passed away, and we shall have passed away with them. While we endeavor to render the present principle of the Constitution as operative and beneficial as possible, let us beware lest, under the plausible pretext of "amendment," we introduce principles destructive of the compact itself. On former occasions, extracts have been read from the speeches and from the writings of eminent statesmen. Permit me to quote a few sentences from an authority which once had great influence in this House. I trust it will now have an effect:

"Towards the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are, at least, as necessary to fix the true character of Government, as of other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing Constitution of a country; that facility in changes upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion exposes to perpetual change, from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion."

These sentiments are from the Farewell Address of that most illustrious statesman and patriot who presided in the Convention which formed this Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I have been greatly gratified by the various motions which have been made, some of them by gentlemen of the majority, to recommend this resolution for the purpose of amendment. It is evident that some of the expressions are so extremely ambiguous and obscure, as to admit a great variety of construction. Such a variety of constructions have, indeed, been given in this House to some of the most important clauses, and so just have been the criticisms upon the phraseology of this resolution, that the necessity of amendment must be obvious to the friends of the resolution. It certainly cannot be necessary to adopt it precisely as it stands. If it must be sent to the State Legislatures, I hope we shall so far respect the reputation of the House as at least to make the resolution intelligible.

Some gentlemen wish so to amend this resolution as to make it conform to that which passed this House, and of which gentlemen were, at that time, so tenacious.

I sincerely hope that two-thirds of this House will never adopt the various alterations of the Constitution, contained in this resolution. If disappointed here, the State Legislatures will, I trust, perceive, that the important right guaranteed to them by this Constitution, once relinquished, can never be regained; that, by defacing the fairest feature of the Constitution, they sacrifice the rights of other States, they hazard the peace, the existence of the Union.

Mr. THOMAS.—A number of gentlemen opposed to this amendment, and particularly the gentleman last up from Massachusetts (Mr. THATCHER,) appear to lay great stress on exceptions to the phraseology of the resolution. In the first paragraph, they contend that it is absurd, because it reads: "which when ratified by three-fourths of the Legislatures of the several States." I agree with the gentlemen that it would have read better, to my mind, had it said: "which when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the said States;" and it would have been nigher the phrase made use of in the Constitution. But, as on all occasions like this, when there are precedents, as to form, we generally adopt them; the Senate appear to have done it in this instance. I wish gentlemen to examine a resolution of the first Congress, under this Constitution, proposing a number of amendments to the State Legislatures. They will find, in that resolution, it is thus expressed: "which when ratified by three-fourths of the Legislatures of the said States." Now, I ask, what is the difference in the phraseology of these two resolutions? One says: "when ratified by three-fourths of the Legislatures of the several States." The other, which I have just read, says: "when ratified by three-fourths of the Legislatures of the said States." For my part, I can see no difference between these two; besides, in my opinion, it is altogether unimportant whether anything is said in the resolution about its being ratified by three-fourths, all, or any of the State Legislatures. I believe it sufficient that the bare proposition go out from Congress, and when it has received the ratification of the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, the Constitution itself, which is paramount to anything we can say on the subject, declares it to be a part of that instrument. And I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, or any other gentleman on this floor, whether this is not correct? Whether what is said on the resolution, or what we could say, in relation to its ratification by the State Legislatures, can possibly affect its validity? It cannot; therefore, all that has been said about that part goes for nothing.

With respect to the criticism of gentlemen as to the wording of the second paragraph, I wish they would read the exceptionable sentence, and then compare that with the one on the same subject in the Constitution. [Here Mr. T. read the two, and then said:] To my mind it appears plain, and properly enough expressed; and I do consider that the objections to the phraseology of that part are equally preposterous with the other.

Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. T.,) I am in favor of the resolution as it now stands, and shall give it my decided support. I, however, acknowledge that I should like it better myself, without the provision made by the Senate, that the Vice President should act as President, in case no election should be made by the House of Representatives previous to the fourth of March, when the choice devolves on them; and as several gentlemen have expressed a desire that a trial should be made to effect this alteration. I wish the Speaker to inform me whether if the House should amend the resolution, and the Senate should not concur in the amendment, when it comes down again to this House, a majority cannot rescind the amendment, or whether it will require two-thirds? Because, although I have heretofore voted against a recommitment, if the Speaker is of the opinion that a majority can rescind, I am willing to make the trial, and shall, in that case, move to recommit the resolution to a Committee of the whole House for that purpose.

The SPEAKER said, he considered it improper to give an opinion on a question of order relating to a subject not immediately before the House. He said, on all incidental questions, he considered a majority sufficient.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD.—I feel no disposition to protract the debate to any considerable length. Nor can I flatter myself that any remarks which I shall make will convince a single member of the House, whose opinions have been formed in favor of the resolution, of its pernicious tendency. But upon a question of so much importance, I must be permitted to state, in a concise manner, some of those considerations which will induce me to give my decided negative to the measure.

The election of a President is a transaction of vast importance to the United States. In the hands of this officer is deposited the Executive power of the Government; the Constitution having expressly declared that "the Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." On the execution of this power depends, in a great measure, the character and prosperity of the country. The President is entrusted with the execution of the laws. He appoints, with the consent of the Senate, the Judicial and Executive officers. He forms, and with the advice of the Senate concludes, treaties, and in his hands is virtually lodged the peace and safety of the country. Even the right of declaring war, although nominally confided to the Legislature, must be substantially controlled by the acts of the Executive; because it must generally happen that the necessity of war will depend on the management of our foreign relations by the President, and the power of terminating a war by treaty rests with him. In a period of war the President is the Executive to conduct it, and in a time of peace he is the guardian of our neutral rights. A power so important and extensive must necessarily carry along with it vast patronage and influence; and a President may at all times become emphatically a blessing or a scourge to the community.

From this hasty sketch may be perceived the deep interest which every State has in the Presidential election.

The election of the first magistrate of a nation has always been considered the most difficult part of the science of government. The authority which the office necessarily confers, the respect which it creates, and the patronage which it gives, must render it the great object of ambition to aspiring men. The Journal of the General Convention shows that this subject created more difficulty than any other which fell under the deliberations of that respectable body. To organize the election in such a manner as to guard against popular cabals and corruption on the one hand, and to secure a proper dependance on the people on the other; to prevent improper combinations of States or of individuals, and at the same time to give each State its due weight and influence in the election, was no easy task. They formed, however, the great objects which engaged the attention of the Convention; and after every project had received a deliberate consideration, that body agreed upon the plan under which we have successfully practised for fourteen years. It is now proposed to introduce an essential and radical change in this plan, and we are called upon to decide whether we will recommend the change to the States. Under these circumstances, it cannot be improper to caution gentlemen against precipitancy, and to request them to examine critically the nature of our Government, and to be careful that they do not, under the pretext of amendment and reform, violate one of the first and most important principles of the Union.

The Government of the United States is not a consolidated Government; it is strictly federal, and its friends are of course federalists. It is true, that this branch of the Legislature (the House of Representatives) bears many marks of a consolidation. We are the Representatives of the people of the respective States, and in this respect the principle of consolidation may be considered as existing in this House. But in the Senate, nothing but the federative principle is seen. In that body, each State is not only represented as a sovereign State, but the representation is equal; nor can the size, population, or wealth of a State, increase or diminish its rights or its vote on that floor. In the election of a President, the federative principle is likewise discernable. That officer is elected by Electors, chosen in such manner as the State Legislatures shall direct, and to consist of a number of Electors equal to the Senators and Representatives of each State. By this arrangement, the choice of President is controlled by the States; and although the large States have a greater influence in the election than the small States, yet this influence is not entirely regulated by population. The votes to which each State is entitled for its Senators increases the influence of the small States; and it is in consequence of this, that the State of Rhode Island now gives four votes for President, when, upon the principle of consolidation, she would be entitled to no more than two. The votes of Delaware, on the same principle, would be reduced from three to one.

There is not a feature of our Government more strongly marked than this of its Confederation, nor any to which the people are more strongly attached. And it would be impossible to submit any proposition which could create more alarm than a direct project of consolidating the States into one Government. The States always have, and probably will continue, to preserve with jealousy their sovereignty and independence. The present Government, it is well known, grew out of the old Confederation; in which form the States were, in every respect, equal—each State having one vote in the National Congress. The innovation which was made on the pure federative principle by the present Constitution was the result of necessity and compromise. But still, as has been already observed, the federative principle is distinctly preserved, and remains the great and leading feature of the Constitution.

It has been often repeated, that the Constitution of the United States was the result of compromise between the large and the small States. This is undoubtedly true, and the basis of this compromise ought to be considered as sacred—never to be shaken whilst the Constitution endures. After mutual concessions by the large and small States, (for both may be considered as conceding something,) the principles by which the influence of each State is balanced in the Legislative and Executive departments may be fairly considered as constituting the basis of this compromise. It results from this, that every attempt to diminish the influence of large States on the one hand, or to weaken that of the small States on the other, is sapping the foundation of our Confederacy. The power to amend the Constitution was not given to authorize the change of any radical principle in which particular States might be interested. This power, it is well known, was given for very different purposes.

I have made these general observations, because it has appeared to me that every proposal to amend the Constitution ought to be first tested by the nature and scope of the Constitution itself; and if it shall be found to interfere with the rights of States, or with any fundamental principle of the compact, it ought to be rejected, although it may promise some temporary advantages in the eyes of speculative men. It cannot be too often repeated, that in considering projects for changing the Constitution, we ought to consider what the Constitution is, and not what it ought to be, in the opinion of individuals. Our Government is in fact a Confederacy, and as such we are bound to respect the rights of each party to the compact.

In respect to the resolution under consideration, the first principle I assume is, that it must necessarily diminish the influence of small States in the election of a Chief Magistrate, and, of course, that it is a direct violation of that spirit of compromise which produced the Constitution.

The effect of the proposed amendment upon the influence of small States, in the Presidential election, has scarcely been denied on the floor of the House. Indeed, after the very able and lucid exposition of this part of the subject, by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HUGER,) some days ago, it appears to be generally understood and admitted that the power of the small States, in this great point of electing a President, must be diminished. Under such circumstances, it can scarcely be necessary to repeat arguments or to support a position which has been so clearly sustained in the debate. But as this is a point of great magnitude, and (if well understood) must be felt in every small State, I will take the liberty of adverting again to some of the proofs on which the assertion rests.

If the proposed amendment is adopted, it will remain in the power of five large States to combine, and with perfect certainty to give a President and Vice President to the Union. As the electoral votes were distributed under the last census, this power may be exercised by Virginia, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, New York, and Massachusetts. To say that no such combination can be formed, is speaking without a knowledge of the human character. And although a combination of the particular States which I have named cannot at this time be formed, yet it is certain that a combination of large States, equally effectual, may at this moment be produced. Gentlemen deceive themselves, if they imagine that the large States can have no interest or inducement to form these combinations. We ought not to forget that our Government is a confederacy of States; that the office of President is vastly important, and that the State which can possess the Executive power in the person of one of its own citizens, is necessarily elevated above the other members of the Confederacy. Nor can we forget our own feelings as men. There is not a member of this House who does not feel particularly attached to the State to which he belongs—whose pride would not be gratified by seeing the State which he represents giving a President to the Union, and a tone to the Government—who does not believe that the interests of those with whom he is particularly connected would on many occasions be better, and on every occasion be as well secured under the administration of a President from his own State as from any other quarter. Whenever communities or individuals are stimulated by the powerful inducements of interest or ambition to form combinations, they will necessarily be created. And although at this time there is no State which can openly claim the exclusive right of giving a President to the Union, yet this right may be enjoyed in rotation by a few large States, in defiance of any combination which can be formed against them. We have already seen, upon one occasion, some evidence of a combination crumbling to pieces by the jealousies which the present peculiar mode of election has excited.

It might appear to a cursory observer that the same combinations may be formed under the existing mode of election, it being equally in the power of the large States to give a President and Vice President to the Union. But a critical attention to the subject will satisfy gentlemen that the present mode of election must necessarily create so much jealousy among the large States as to render all lasting combinations impracticable. As the election is now regulated, each Elector must give his vote for two candidates for the office of President, one of whom must be the citizen of a State to which the Elector does not belong. Under such circumstances, if the large States should combine for the purpose of securing to themselves the two offices, they must give to each of their candidates nearly an equal number of votes; in which case it will be left in the power of a small State to decide the election in favor of the least objectionable candidate. The effect of which must often be to defeat the plan of rotation agreed upon by the large States, and to create suspicions that the votes of a small State thus given to the successful candidate have been obtained by a secret combination with the State to which the candidate belongs, or with the candidate himself. In the same manner, the views of any particular State may be forever defeated by the small States; and such views will be defeated if any one of the States, from its local situation, its great extent, and its population, should arrogate to itself the right of giving a President. Gentlemen must be sensible that no combination formed under such circumstances can be lasting. Political combinations can only be lasting where the object for which they are formed is obtained with certainty, and where no jealousies are excited. But where the object is defeated, where jealousies arise, and more especially where the views of the most powerful and ambitious member of the combination are forever defeated, the combination can never endure.

The advantages resulting to the small States from the present mode of election is not confined to the power of defeating the combination of large States. It is certainly important to possess the power of selecting the least objectionable of two candidates. Although neither candidate may be the particular object of our choice, there may still exist, in our opinion, a wide difference in their respective qualifications for office. Whenever a candidate has been preferred to his rival, by the suffrages of his political opponents, he will entertain those sentiments towards them which every liberal mind must feel towards those who have granted a favor. He will be conscious that he is indebted to them for office. He will feel bound to treat them with respect, and promote their interests. Such are the sentiments which must be entertained by every man under similar circumstances—such are the sentiments which the presiding officer of the House must always feel when promoted to the chair, in consequence of the division of his own party by his political opponents. This influence of the small States in the Presidential election will promote the harmony of the Union. The power of the small States, although circumscribed, may, under certain circumstances, become effectual. And as public bodies and individuals, in all political transactions, are caressed and respected in proportion to their power, the small States will be courted and respected by the large States, and the mutual dependence which they feel on each other must soften their passions, and in a great measure diminish those State animosities which endanger our domestic tranquility. And will gentlemen tell me that these advantages are of no importance? In my opinion they are advantages which not only tend to harmonize the Union, but they form the strongest barrier for the small States in one of the most important transactions of the nation, against the overwhelming power of the large States. It is this peculiar mode of election which can render the votes of small States truly efficient in the choice of a President. Strip the Constitution of this feature—introduce the discriminating principle, and you transfer the whole power to the large States. Their combinations cannot be defeated; and whilst they give you a President and Vice President with perfect certainty, and in perpetual rotation, they will laugh at our interference, and deride our impotency.

Permit me, on this point, to appeal to those gentlemen who represent the large States for the correctness of the opinions which I have expressed, and to ask them whether it is consistent with their characters, as guardians of the Constitution, to avail themselves of the moment of party violence to pursue this serious and radical change, and to aggrandize the States which they represent, at the expense of those with whom they are connected? To those gentlemen who represent small States, it would not be necessary, under any other circumstances, to make an appeal. The interests of the States to which they belong would not be forgotten. But this is a moment when every object appears to be forgotten but the temporary views of party; and I must be permitted to remind those gentlemen, that if they suffer themselves to be carried along by the torrent, and consent to abandon the interests of the States to which they belong, their votes can never be recalled. If they agree to the resolution, and the amendment should be grafted upon the Constitution, the rights thus sacrificed are lost forever. For myself, I should be as well satisfied to see an amendment which should, in express terms, confine the choice of President to certain large States, as to see the resolution on your table. The effect must be precisely the same. But as it is not my intention to consume much of the time of the House, I will waive all further remarks upon this part of the subject.

There is another view of this subject, which furnishes to my mind a conclusive argument against the proposed amendment. In all governments which have hitherto existed, in which the elective principle has extended to the Executive Magistrate, it has been impossible, for any length of time, to guard against corruption in the elections. The danger is not an imaginary one, in this country. The office of President is at this time the great object of ambition, and as the wealth and population of this country increases, the powers and patronage of the President must necessarily be extended. We cannot expect to escape the fate of other Republics. Candidates for the office of President will arise, who, under the assumed garb of patriotism and disinterested benevolence, will disguise the most unprincipled ambition. Corruption will be practised by such candidates, whenever it can be done with success.

It is therefore an object of the first importance, to regulate the election in such a manner as to remove, as far as possible, both the temptation and the means of corruption. If gentlemen will attend to the proposed amendment with reference to this point, they will find that the means and the temptation to corruption must be increased. As the Constitution now stands, the man who aspires to the office of President, can at best but run the race on equal terms with some individual of his own party. In order to succeed, he must not only obtain for himself and his associate, a greater number of votes than his own political opponents, but he must obtain more votes than the associate himself. The chances of success are by those means rendered more remote, and however desirable the office may be, the temptation to enter the list, or to make individual exertions, are diminished. The means of corruption must generally be found in the offices at the disposal of the President; and these, it is well known, constitute a fund of great extent, and where the election is brought to such a point, as to rest with two candidates only, this fund may be used with great success. One office may be promised to this Elector as the price of his vote, whilst other offices are promised to other Electors on the same corrupt consideration, and the aspiring candidate may thus mount to the first office in the Government. But so long as your elections remain on this present footing, the means of corruption are diminished; because the aspiring candidate can only promise this corrupt distribution of offices upon eventually succeeding to the Presidency, and as his chances of success are diminished by the mode of election, his promises are of less value to the Elector, and of course will be less frequently made, and more generally rejected.

So far as I can understand the objections which are made to the present mode of election, they are brought within a narrow compass. They consist principally of a general and loose assertion, that it is reasonable and proper Electors should on all occasions designate the man they intend for a particular office; and secondly, that the experience of the last Presidential election shows the necessity of a designation in this particular case.

If it was true, that one man only could be found within the United States qualified to fill the office of President, there would be force in the first objection. But such is not the fact. There are men to be found in every State, eminently qualified for this important trust. Where then can be the necessity of confining the votes of Electors to a single candidate? Is it an hardship upon an Elector to be compelled to vote for two candidates, when two may so easily be found? And are there not advantages arising from this mode, of a serious and decisive nature? I have already mentioned the interest which the small States have in the arrangement, and I have alluded to the door of corruption which the change will open, and it is not necessary at this time to repeat those opinions. But I must be permitted to ask, is it not of some importance, that the most eminent men should be selected for the offices of President and Vice President? The President is elected for four years; he may die within that period—he may be removed from office, or he may become disqualified to execute its duties; in either of these events the Vice President succeeds to the power. Under the existing arrangement you will secure, as far as human prudence can accomplish it, the most eminent men for these two offices. Each candidate must be voted for as President, and if the Electors fairly execute the Constitution, they will give their votes for those men who are the best qualified to administer the Government. Thus, under every probable event, you will find one of the most eminent of your citizens at the head of your Government.

But if the amendment prevails the case must be greatly changed. The man voted for as Vice President will be selected without any decisive view to his qualifications to administer the Government. The office will generally be carried into the market to be exchanged for the votes of some large States for President. And the only criterion which will be regarded as a qualification for the office of Vice President, will be, the temporary influence of the candidate over the Electors of his State. It is in this manner you must expect to obtain a man to fill the second office in the Government, and who must succeed to the power of President, upon every vacancy. The momentary views of party may perhaps be promoted by such arrangements, but the permanent interests of the country are sacrificed.

Far from believing that experience has shown the impropriety of the existing mode of election, I am convinced, so far as it has gone, that it has evinced the wisdom of the arrangement. The general success of the Government is well understood, and exhibits a strong proof in favor of the Constitution, as it now stands. But gentlemen speak of the late election of President by the House of Representatives, and by the manner in which that transaction is described, I am persuaded the circumstances which attended it are not understood. I was a member of the House of Representatives at the time, and I take this occasion to declare that no transaction ever was more grossly misrepresented, than that has been, in every part of this country. When the election commenced in the House of Representatives, every gentleman knew that it must terminate in the choice of one or the other of the two candidates, and the only question was, who could, or would think proper, to persist the longest in support of the candidate he had first chosen. The election was conducted with perfect mildness and good humor; not an expression or look of severity escaped from any one; and when the election was closed, the House proceeded to the ordinary business of the session, as though nothing of particular importance had taken place. The candidates who on that occasion were brought into the House, were both selected by the same political party. It could not be of much importance to that party which should be chosen, nor could it be supposed to be of vast importance to their opponents. The event therefore was certain that an election would be made, and there did not exist the smallest hazard that the Government would be left without a President. Had the election terminated in favor of either candidate, those who brought them into the House must have been satisfied. If the controversy had arisen between two candidates of different political parties, the contest might have been a serious one, but that is a state of things for which the present amendment makes no provision. The public agitation, which it is said by some gentlemen existed at that time, was not called for by the occasion, and must have been harmless. The people of this country are not at this time, nor were they then disposed to rebel against their Constitution and Government. It was not only the right but the duty of the House of Representatives, to select from the two candidates the man who in their opinion was best qualified to execute the office of President. And if the choice had fallen on the gentleman who now presides in the Senate, "all United America," to use the favorite expression of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL,) would have acquiesced in the decision, and submitted without rebellion or insurrection to the Administration.

But there is one important lesson which the experience of that election has taught the people of the United States—it is this, that it becomes the great and solemn duty of Electors, upon all occasions, to give their votes for two men who shall be best qualified for the office of President. The Electors do not, they cannot know which of their own candidates will succeed. They are therefore called upon by every sacred principle to select the most eminent of their fellow-citizens. They will be stimulated on all future occasions, by the experience of the last election, to do, what I trust they have heretofore done, to give their votes for two men, in either of whom they are willing to confide the Executive power of the Government. What then can induce us to change the form of our elections? Some gentlemen have said a great deal about the voice of the people, and declared that the people demand the alteration. This is a language too frequently used within these walls. The purposes for which it is used, I leave to others to explain; but it must be perfectly understood that the clamors of designing men are too often mistaken for the voice of the people. The people are rarely disposed to seek for changes whilst they feel and enjoy the blessings of their old establishments. Be this as it may, we have been sent into this House to obey no voice but that of our own consciences and judgments.

If gentlemen would, upon this occasion, divest themselves of those party considerations, which are so apt to swallow up deliberation, I cannot persuade myself that they would agree to the resolution. When they view the deep wound which it inflicts on the interests of small States—when they see the wide door which it opens to corruption—the certain and pernicious effect which it must produce on the Electors of a Vice President, and the destruction of that balance of power among the States, which was settled by the Constitution, they will at least hesitate, before they give a final vote for the passage of the resolution. The security given by the Constitution to the interests and influence of the different States, in our great national concerns, forms the only basis on which the Government can rest. Disturb those interests, and the Government must tremble to its foundation. And although the effect may not be immediately perceived, yet the day will come when it will be both seen and felt, and the large States, who have now seized a moment of passion to grasp the power, may regret the hour when they violated the compact which binds us together

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

Mr. DENNIS.—Encouraged by the indulgent attention with which the remarks of other gentlemen have been received, I submit to the consideration of the House some observations on the resolution before us. Not having been present when the resolution, which originated in this House, containing alone the discriminating principle, was under consideration, and which it is presumed was fully discussed, because that point was exclusively considered, and deprived of the elaborate and learned argument of the Senate in relation to that principle, I should not have offered myself to the consideration of this House, if there had not been incorporated into the resolution other principles which have been but little investigated, and which, though called subordinate principles, I conceive to be as important as the principle of designation itself.

The friends of the resolution, aware of the influence of names, have chosen to call the two last, secondary principles; have omitted to discuss them themselves, and have presumed that others would regard them as subordinate principles, because they have chosen so to denominate them. It may, however, be shown, that these principles, acknowledged on all hands to be obnoxious, even to many of those who favor what I will term the pre-eminent principle, and which they are admonished to surrender to obtain that object, are far from being so innocent and unimportant as is represented; and that the last one goes essentially to impair if not entirely to defeat the favorite principle of designation itself.

As far as I have been able to develop the leading argument in favor of a discrimination, it is, that by such distinction we shall insure the complete control of the public will, and that the man intended as the secondary, may never become the primary character. But, according to the last member of the resolution, instead of assuring to us that object, in every case where no one candidate shall have a majority of all the votes of the Electors, and where by any means or contrivance a choice in this House can be prevented, the person designated as Vice President becomes the President.

In considering the combined but warring principles of this resolution, we are not to consider their tendency simply in the present state of things, but look to a period when our States and our political parties shall have multiplied their numbers. Scarcely does the earth perform her annual revolution without adding to our existing numbers a sister State; and I will venture to predict that many years will not have passed away when this nation will be divided into three or four political parties. As your States and those parties augment their respective members, so will increase the difficulty of procuring a majority of electoral voices in favor of any individual. Admit that the designating principle may render it less probable that the election shall be brought into this House, as in the case of a tie, the case of a non-election by the electoral bodies, for the reasons before assigned, on account of no one candidate having a majority of votes, may frequently occur.

For, let it be remembered, that this case will be but little affected by the discriminating principle. When the election shall be brought into this House, the increase of States and of parties will in like manner, as in the electoral bodies, render it extremely difficult (even without the influence of fraud or corruption to prevent it,) to effect an union of a sufficient number of members voting by States, where there may be a number of candidates, to give any one of them a majority of the States. A non-election by this House then, by this resolution, is precisely equivalent to an election of the man to the Presidency who was intended as the Vice President; because, by the last member of the resolution, if no choice be made in the House by the fourth of March, then the Vice President, already chosen by the Senate, is to become the President. Thus it is, that by the magical operation of these conflicting principles, you do the very thing you mean to prevent, and elect the man intended as a secondary character to the Chief Executive Magistracy.

Again, sir, in order to secure the certainty of electing a man of the people, you throw the whole weight of the Senatorial branch and of the Vice President, who have nothing to do but to defeat an election here to make him President, into that scale which is opposed to the public will; and you hold out a temptation to the exercise of every species of contrivance which the mind of man, stimulated by a love of power and possessed of allurements to acquire it, may suggest and put into motion in this House, to preponderate the balance on the side of non-election; which non-election is tantamount to an election by the Senate of their President to be the President of the United States.

Nor will the weight of that body be realized alone when the election shall be brought here; but may be exerted in the first instance to multiply candidates, perplex and divide the electoral bodies, and prevent, in them, a majority in favor of any one candidate; so as to bring as many as practicable into this body, in order that they may again perplex and obstruct it.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the Senate ought to have been satisfied, (determined as they have been to innovate on the Constitution in a point never contemplated by any but themselves,) to have provided that the election of their President, a secondary character, should vest him with the powers, emoluments, and patronage of the high office of President of this great nation; so long and no longer than an election should be made. This would have taken away that strong inducement to intrigue and corruption, which results from exhibiting to human frailty the important price of the Chief Magistracy of this country, for four succeeding years. I was about to move such a modification or extension of that principle in Committee of the Whole; but we were told, nay, the friends of the principle of designation were told, that all efforts at amendment, even for changing an obscure and unintelligible phraseology, differently construed by those who held this language too, would be vain and illusory. These intimations have since grown into fact, in the rejection of the resolution this morning submitted by a gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HOGG.) Yes, sir, we are told that although the discriminating principle is the only one to which the public attention has been invited, and the only one embraced in the resolution of this House, yet it must be adopted, because the other branch of the Legislature, not deigning to consider the resolution of this House, have incorporated into it a principle vesting in their own body a novel and important power; and that they will not adopt the one without the other.

But, Mr. Speaker, let me here in a particular manner address myself to those gentlemen who are favorable to the designating principle, and who acknowledge the other to be extremely obnoxious. Can you discharge your duty to your constituents, who have required the one and not the other, and reconcile it to your conscience to take the resolution as it stands? You are told the last is a subordinate principle and must be yielded to effectuate the main design. Is that a subordinate principle which transfers the choice in any contingency from this House to the Senate? Is that a minor principle which not only makes that transfer from the immediate representatives of the people, to a body much less responsible to the public, but changes the mode of voting by States to a vote per capita?

You are told the object of amending the Constitution is to conform the choice of the President to the will of the people. But is this object attained by holding out temptations to frustrate that will in the first place, and transferring the jurisdiction from the House of Representatives to the Senate in the second?

But you are told you must do so, otherwise the Senate will not agree to your principle of designation. Other gentlemen may be in possession of means of individual information to which I am a stranger, but sure I am, we do not possess that information as a body, which warrants the assertion. Have you ever asked them to recede, or signified your wishes on the subject? Has not every effort of the kind been rejected by this House? Shall it be said that whilst our rules indicate the propriety of this course in case of a difference between the two branches, in ordinary legislation, we will not make one attempt to expunge from the resolution principles which almost all of us declare to be repugnant to our wishes?

You are told that the people of the United States and the Legislatures of the States imperiously demand a change of the Constitution. In relation to the discriminating principle, let it be conceded; but, have the people or the States required you to transfer your own power to the Senate, and has the declamation respecting the will of the people any application to the two last principles of the resolution? No. I will venture to assert that this ingenious contrivance had its origin in the other branch of the Legislature.

We are told we have only the initiative in the business, and our acts are to undergo the revision of the State Legislatures; and, therefore, the less need for that caution and deliberation which might otherwise be requisite. It would be a very poor excuse in a judge of an inferior court to say he was less sedulous to understand a legal question, and to decide correctly upon it, because his decision would be revised by a superior tribunal. We should not transfer into the hands of others that trust which is confided to ourselves. I will not say that there is not any individual in any State Legislature who is not possessed of as much knowledge as any individual here; but I will say, that it is not to be calculated that the Legislative body of any State possesses as much collective knowledge as does this House, of a subject affecting not only individuals but States differently situated in regard to geographical position, population, wealth, and interests. That the decision of this House will have its influence on the State Legislatures is not to be doubted, and therefore we should scrutinize the contrariant principles of the resolution, and go as far as practicable to remove its defects.

I have said, in the course of the discussion on some incidental questions, that to say I would in no case change the Constitution, would be using unconstitutional doctrines, because the instrument contains within it a principle of its amendment, and it may be necessary to conform it to new circumstances and contingencies as they emerge. But I have also said, and beg leave to repeat it, that to induce a change of it, the existing evil ought to be clearly demonstrated, and the aptitude of the remedy proposed to effectuate the object ought to be unequivocally established. The alteration of the Constitution of the United States is of a more delicate nature than to change that of a single State. In one case you have only to quiet the apprehensions and compose the disquietude of discordant individuals; in the other to disarm the jealousies and reconcile the interests of jarring States. To this distinction those gentlemen who have reposed the whole argument on the basis of the popular will, have not sufficiently attended.

A gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. CAMPBELL,) and other gentlemen who have advocated the adoption of the resolution, have informed us that this Constitution was adopted by, and that the departments ought to be organized according to, the dictates of a majority of the people. Admit it to be so, and that the designating principle will produce the effect I have endeavored to show, the whole resolution will defeat it. But, I beg leave to enter my dissent to their theory of our Government. That the will of the majority in a republican Government, and in a single State, must and ought to prevail, I do not deny; but I wholly deny this to be the theory of the American Confederacy. The Constitution of the United States was not adopted by the people of the United States, but by the people of the several States as such, voting through the medium of their State Conventions; and, so far from its being adopted by the people of the United States as such, it is doubtful whether it was not adopted by a minority of the people, though ratified and confirmed by a majority of the adopting States. North Carolina and Rhode Island rejected it, and in Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New York, the minorities were powerful. The minority in Virginia and Pennsylvania alone were more than equal to counter-vail the majorities of five or six of the smaller States; so that, if the vote had been taken by the whole American people voting together, it is doubtful if it had ever been adopted.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

When we view it in relation to the organization of the departments, they are equally mistaken. The House of Representatives, which partakes most of the popular or consolidated principle, is not chosen by the will of the people of the United States, but in different modes, by the people of the respective States. The Senate partakes in its mode of appointment exclusively of the federative principle, without regard to the number of individuals contained in the several States.

When we come to the organization of the Executive department, we find an intermixture of federative and popular or consolidated principles, combined and interwoven with so delicate a hand that it is impossible to strip it of the one without destroying the other. The Electors who choose the President are not chosen in a manner to ascertain the sense of the people of the United States, but are chosen in some States by the Legislatures, in others by the people voting in a general ticket, and smothering the voice of the minority; while, in others, the choice is made by the people voting in districts, and giving the proportional weight to the minority. The number of Electors likewise assigned to the different States depend on the combined number of the Senators and Representatives of each State in the Congress of the United States; so that a State having one Representative, has two votes on the federative principle, to one on the popular principle. The result of this analysis of the Constitution will satisfy gentlemen that State interests are materially affected by this amendment; and that the public will, always equivocal, is not the only thing to be considered in this particular. Indeed, sir, it proves to them that, instead of giving complete effect to the popular will, the choice of the Electors is made through the medium of so refined a process, and in so artificial a manner, that it may happen that a majority of the Electors may be chosen and the President elected by a minority of the people. I believe, sir, a President of the United States has been elected by a minority of the people of the United States.

We have been told that numerous amendments have been made to the Constitution, and it is therefore proved by experience that those State jealousies and other dangers, which are represented as likely to arise from this amendment, have no place except in the imagination of the opponents of the resolution. I think I shall not be considered as metaphysical, however, when I declare that, there occurs to my mind a material distinction between an amendment which goes merely to enlarge or abridge the Legislative power, or the power of any given department, and one which materially changes the manner in which one of the departments itself is organized.

All the amendments heretofore made are of the first description; operating merely on the popular, and affecting in no wise the federative principle; there was no ground for local jealousy. But, in this case, for the first time, you are affecting the organization of the departments, and, of course, the federative principle; and the arguments used in this discussion have but too well demonstrated the State jealousies and inquietudes likely to result from every such amendment between the large and smaller States. Representing a State which occupies and is likely to maintain, for a long time to come, a middle position in the Union, I have not critically examined whether the resolution will operate for or against the one or the other; but I know that there are jealousies on this subject, and we ought to be cautious not to fan the flame. If there be individuals in this nation hostile to the Union, (and we have been admonished that such exist,) let us be cautious how we put into their mouths the strongest arguments to effectuate their designs; and, let me again repeat it, there must always exist inquietude both among States and individuals wherever you attempt to change the mode of organizing a department, and every amendment you make tends to weaken the bond of our Union. The idea of the friends of the resolution, on the subject of changes in the Constitution, therefore, is wholly erroneous, when they suppose there is nothing to be considered but what they call the public will; and they have made the mistake by regarding the Confederacy as a consolidated Government. But it partakes of this equality in no instance, except in the operation of its laws. Here it reaches our citizens as one people, regardless of State limits and State inequalities. It is this property alone which forms the distinguishing characteristic between that system and the Confederation. Here we operate upon the people, and there they operated on States through the medium of requisitions. I am sensible I have availed myself to the full extent of the patience of the Committee, and shall conclude with an exhortation that we do nothing which may affect the harmony of our Union; and that we revise, and revise again, this resolution, before we stamp it with our sanction.

Mr. JACKSON.—Mr. Speaker, when I came to the House this morning, nothing was more foreign to my intention than to trespass upon their indulgence, but the importance of the subject, and the bold and daring assertions made by gentlemen in the opposition, will be my apology for the remarks I shall make, and I promise the House as a remuneration for the attention they may honor me with, to be as concise as possible. Sir, I must call that a bold and daring assertion, made by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. PURVIANCE,) that if the small States had contemplated a change in the Constitution, and had not considered it as inviolable and intangible, they would not have come into the Union; when I look at the Constitution and see used not vague expressions or dubious language admitting of its amendment, but an express article, to wit: the fifth, authorizing amendments and designating the mode by which they may be obtained, which declares that—shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to the Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by Congress."

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses

And when I consider the perspicuous and emphatical language used by its framers, that they have not inserted a single clause not intended to have a full meaning, and that they were incapable of holding forth a feature in the Constitution which should be construed contrary to the plain acceptance of it, I am induced to believe that the gentleman has not paid a proper attention to the subject, or he would not have hazarded the observation.

The same gentleman has said, we are about to encourage fraud, intrigue, venality, and corruption, by the passage of this resolution; my respect for decorum and the rules of this House prevents me from answering this assertion in the language it deserves. I may, however, be permitted to say that the reverse will be the case; and I contend that there is more danger that fraud, intrigue, venality, and corruption, will be practised in cases resulting from the Constitution as it now stands, than there will be under the amendment before us, if adopted. To illustrate my position, I will suppose an understanding and agreement among the States, (for without them no election for President can take place,) that A shall be supported as President, and B as Vice President; will not the importance of the office, and the probability of success, under the want of the discriminating principle, warrant the assertion that there is great danger of intrigue, to secure the election of B, the ostensible candidate for the office of Vice President to the Presidential chair, by reducing some of the Electors in one of the States to violate the agreement thus made with the sister States, in voting for him only, whom none but themselves, and those active in the intrigue, contemplate to be President, and thereby a President will be crammed upon us, whom nine-tenths of the people never thought of? Much has been said by gentlemen respecting the spirit of compromise and accommodation which governed the framers of the Constitution, and it is contended that this spirit of accommodation and compromise will be materially affected, and one of the main principles of the Constitution violated by this amendment. I admit that a spirit of compromise and accommodation influenced some of the framers of that instrument, but I deny that it was mutual. There certainly was a noble magnanimity evinced in the accommodating spirit of the Representatives of the large States, to induce the small States to come into the Union, but that spirit was not reciprocal. I believe that those who represented the large States justly estimated the danger and rivalries of neighboring States, if not subject to one confederated Government, competent to their individual protection. The fate of other little Republics warranted the idea that the smaller members would be swallowed up by the larger ones, who would, in turn, attack each other; and that the liberty achieved by the blood of some of the bravest men that ever lived would pass away without leaving a trace behind it. They, therefore, yielded everything to the little States, knowing they were most numerous, and naturally jealous of the large ones. If we examine the Constitution, we shall find the whole of the great powers of the Government concentrated in the Senate. They have the sole power of trying impeachments, and of making treaties. Congress may declare war; but, once declared, they cannot make peace; that power as well as the boundless, undefined, treaty-making power, generally, are exclusively vested in the Senate; in the Legislative power they possess an absolute veto on the passage of every measure sanctioned by the Representatives of the people; and how are they chosen? Two from each State; the smallest State has the same influence in that body with the largest. In the choice of Electors of President the small States have this additional extraordinary privilege of choosing one Elector for each Senator, and if the election of President comes into the House of Representatives each State has equal power. The small States also possess the power, under the Constitution, of reducing the Representatives on this floor to one from each State, and in such event of completely controlling the power of the large States in every department of the Government, for the Constitution, says:

"The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative."

I therefore think that, in the formation of this Constitution, the accommodation was exclusively on the part of the large States, and that, of course, it was not reciprocal. Though the large States have not their due share of power, I do not complain. I only infer that, as the small States have almost all the power of the Government, or may get it by amendments, and as they are vested with all this power, without an equivalent given to the large States, they are most interested in the existence of the Constitution, and if most interested in its preservation they are also most interested in the adoption of this amendment, because I have proven that intrigue and corruption are more likely to occur under the Constitution, wanting the discriminating principle, than under the amendment now proposed; and I ask gentlemen whether any engine that can be set in motion will be more destructive to this Constitution than fraud, intrigue, venality, and corruption? Sir, the friends of republican Government have justly considered that the great danger it has to dread is from overgrown Executive power, and from the desperate efforts of aspiring individuals to obtain it. Render the election a matter of chance, make the Electors vote blindfolded, as they now do, and often indeed will the election come into the House of Representatives, where (I wish to be understood, I speak not of the present time, I believe the present Representatives would spurn at every effort to influence them improperly,) intrigue, venality, and corruption will be brought to a focus with wealth and all the allurements of office in the train, arrayed against virtue, and the wishes of the nation. Will there not be great danger that corruption will be played off here in such a way as to induce the members to disregard the voice of the people, and elevate to supreme Executive power an aspiring individual? Sir, experience has borne testimony against the present mode of election. Let us not reject its admonitions. By recurring to the situation of this country, not long since, it will be recollected that there was serious danger of a dissolution of the Government, and I believe it was felt in the most remote parts of the United States. Under the discriminating principle now contemplated, the election will not, probably in one case out of a hundred, be brought into the House of Representatives, and the awful crisis of alarm, to which I have alluded, never occur again.

I observed, upon a former occasion, when this subject was before us, that the polar star of republicanism was, that the majority should govern; and that, so far as we have deviated from that principle, our Constitution is anti-republican. Shall we reject the present favorable opportunity to give efficacy to that principle in a most essential branch of our Government? and, by adhering to a mode which experience has proven is fraught with imminent danger, suffer the minority of this nation to choose a President of the United States? For, unless we sacrifice the election of Vice President, they may vote for him whom we intend for that office, and thereby make him, contrary to the wishes of the majority, the President of the United States. If we desire to reward talents and patriotism with the highest office in the power of the nation to bestow, we shall be obliged to give up the Vice Presidency to the minority, and thereby set a price of $80,000 on the head of the President, with all the honors and offices of the nation, to be given to a political enemy. I hope, sir, as such a state of things may happen, we shall take care to guard against it. The gentleman from Connecticut says this subject is not understood by the American people, and, that it may be understood, he wishes it to be discussed here, in the newspapers, and in the State Legislatures. Sir, it has been, long since, discussed here and elsewhere, and is, in my opinion, well understood. In several State Legislatures, whose politics correspond with those of that gentleman, (and which will, therefore, be allowed by him to have been uninfluenced by party zeal,) as well as in States which correspond in political opinion with the majority of this House, it has been repeatedly examined, and the States have almost invariably concurred in recommending the discriminating principle, in the election of President and Vice President. Can there be a stronger evidence of its justice than its being recommended at a time when party views were out of the question? The gentleman is correct when he says the interests of the States are implicated by this amendment. Sir, I believe there are talents and virtue sufficient in the State Legislatures to discern the import of measures implicating their interests, and to adopt or reject them as those interests dictate; they will not be thankful to the gentleman and his political friends for attempting upon this, as on a former, occasion, to guard the people against themselves as their worst enemies. Much has been said against the details of this amendment. I acknowledge, sir, I am one of those who do not like them all, but I think the cases in which inconvenience is apprehended, so extreme and unlikely to occur, that I am unwilling to hazard the great principle of the amendment on account of them. I am not disposed to risk a certain good, by guarding against a visionary evil, which it may be supposed will result from it. I believe the guarding against the right of the Senate to elect a President would be providing for an extreme case that will never happen. For, as I before observed, it is not likely that the election will come into the House of Representatives for a century to come, if the discriminating principle be adopted; and when it does come into this House, it is not to be presumed they will neglect to make a choice, when, in that case, they know the Senate have the authority. I ask, if a man would not be esteemed mad, who, having a ship and its cargo in the hands of an enemy, should refuse to accept the restoration of the one without the other? As the Constitution at present stands it has, in a great measure, placed the election (as I have attempted to show) in the hands of a minority—in the hands of political enemies—and out of the control of the majority? Shall we suffer this to be the case, because we cannot make the resolution more perfect; although we acknowledge it contains a most essential amendment, and almost all the States, before the prevalence of party spirit, declared an alteration necessary? These are my reasons for voting for the resolution, and I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. STANTON.—Mr. Speaker, I exceedingly regret that I cannot forbear troubling the House with a few remarks, in justification of the vote I am about to give, on the all-important resolution on your table, for amending the Constitution of the United States. Sir, that venerable body, who were the framers of that valuable instrument, presupposed that, after its merits had undergone the ordeal of experience, it would need amendment. All intelligent, well-disposed men, of every description, agree that the main object of Government is, or ought to be, such as expressed in the language introductory to our Constitution: "to promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity;" that being the case, it strongly recommends the adoption of the resolution in contemplation. That part of the national compact that relates to the choice of President and Vice President, which does not permit the Electors to designate on their ballots who they vote for as President and Vice President, which envelopes the Electors in darkness, and cannot be reconciled with the good purpose of the Convention, but by their own sentiments expressed in their letter to the President of Congress, signed by their illustrious President, the words are emphatical :

"This important consideration, seriously and deeply impressed on our minds, led each State in the Convention to be less rigid on points of inferior magnitude than might have been otherwise expected, and thus the Constitution, which we now present, is the result of a spirit of amity, and of that mutual deference and concession which the peculiarity of our situation rendered indispensable."

For it evidently appears that the divided situation of the Convention was such, in consequence of the difference among the several States as to their particular extent, habits, and particular interests. This being the case, the Convention was obliged to submit to improprieties and imperfections, and to wait the test of experience on the merits of the compact. Sir, I am hostile to the doctrine advanced on this floor, that the least innovation in this sacred charter would endanger the tranquillity of the Union. At the same time, I admit that it should not be touched but for cogent reasons and emergencies like the present. Sir, that Constitution which, in its operation, tends most to promote the happiness of the people, by rewarding intrinsic merit, defending the innocent, and affording speedy and effectual redress of grievances, is the best. No doubt but the framers of the national compact, in all their deliberations, kept in view the greatest good of the people. And, while I am disposed to pay homage to their superior talents and patriotism, I am unwilling to pay them a compliment or encomium that may, in the least degree, depreciate the good sense of their creator, the people. I believe our Constitution is as free from imperfections as any on earth, yet it is, like all other human productions, susceptible of improvement. Sir, the fifth article in the Constitution says :

"The Congress, when two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress; and that no State without its consent shall be deprived by its equal suffrage in the Senate."

This article, that forever keeps open the door for amendment, and secures an equal suffrage in the Senate, and gives an equal vote in the choice of a President, in the event of no choice by Electors, is the life, beauty, and quintessence of the Constitution. Sir, I recollect that, yesterday, when this subject was discussed, an honorable member from Connecticut repeatedly called on the friends of the resolution to point out one evil that had resulted to the people of the Union from the existing Constitution. Sir, permit me to ask the honorable gentleman where he was at the awful crisis of the Presidential election, when the public mind was agitated and tossed to and fro on the tempestuous sea of doubt, and forced to the verge of despair? Surely the honorable gentleman must have been out of the United States, or out of his senses, or he must have lost his usual sagacity, patriotism, and sound regard for the honor of his country, or he must have recollected the alarming catastrophe. Even had he been among the antipodes, who walk on the other side of the globe, with their feet opposite to ours, he would almost have heard the destructive sound, which seemed to be from the clouds, and penetrate the solid earth. Sir, I ought to apologize for this digression and detention of the House; but, while I am up, I hope to be indulged to make a few remarks on what dropped from an honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, who appeared an able advocate for the discriminating part of the resolution, and opposed the clause relative to the ex-President acting as President in the event of certain contingencies. But, he suddenly seems to change his ground, and says, the most objectionable part of this amendment, in the opinion of many gentlemen, and against which the gentleman from Vermont in particular has levelled his keenest darts, is that which vests the Vice President with power to discharge the duties of President in the event of a President not being elected; and proceeds by saying, at first view it appears liable to objections, but, on a candid and fair investigation, the objections lose their weight and the principle is found, in his opinion, correct. Sir, I beg leave to differ with the honorable gentleman, not only in this, but also on another position, where he says, it will also operate as a stimulus to the House of Representatives to make an election. I think, sir, it will produce a contrary effect; they will, I fear, consider themselves exonerated from the imperative language of the present Constitution, that says: "They shall immediately choose a President." Sir, after viewing the whole ground, and notwithstanding the imperfections of the resolution in its present form, as it contains the discriminating principle, which alone was all I wished to obtain, I shall give it my feeble support. Being fully impressed in my mind that, by adopting the designating principle contained in the resolution, it will frustrate the machinations of factions, secure in future a fair expression of the public will, and tend to increase the domestic happiness, and national prosperity and glory.

Mr. GREGG said, he regretted the expression he had made yesterday, as it appeared to have given dissatisfaction to some gentlemen. That expression had, however, been misconceived. He had said, that the people were in favor of the discriminating principle; he had said that this country was divided into two parties, and that an amendment for the establishment of this principle had at one time been brought forward by one party and then by the other; he had said that one of these parties was called republican, and the other federal. He did not consider this last term an imputation on any gentleman. Some gentlemen were called federalists; he was called a republican. They differed, it was true, in political sentiment; but he had never understood that gentlemen thought there was anything reproachful in being called federalists; on the contrary, he knew the time when the epithet was deemed honorable.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

Mr. LEIB moved a postponement of the subject till Monday. Lost—ayes 41.

A motion to adjourn was then made, and lost.

Mr. ELLIOT.—There are two or three remarks, which fell from me in the animation of debate, I wish to explain. I used the observation of rash precipitancy as applicable to the majority in this business; of personal indecorum, imperious necessity, and Senatorial authority, as applicable to particular members. I also observed that there were men of both parties, who, in my opinion, were aspiring and unprincipled. I beg leave explicitly to state that I did not, at the time I made this remark, entertain an idea of any individual citizen. I alluded to no particular person. The remark was general, and I believe it to have been just. As to the charge of rash precipitancy, I did not mean to apply it to the majority. Perhaps I was wrong in making it; I hope I was. When, at an advanced stage of the debate, I intimated a wish to be heard, when no more than one day had been spent on the subject, and when I declared myself too much exhausted and indisposed to declare my opinions at that late hour, the House, by a great majority, deprived me of the time necessary to do justice to my ideas. For a moment, I felt myself placed in a humiliating and degraded situation; in such a situation as I thought no Representative, and particularly a Representative of one of the largest districts in the Union, containing a population of between fifty and sixty thousand souls, ought to be placed. If there was in this procedure anything of rash precipitancy, it was, perhaps, the error of the moment; and what I considered at the time as the offspring of temper and passion, may have been nothing more than an evidence of that disposition to which the greatest men have told us the first bodies in the world are sometimes exposed. If the body did, for a moment, yield to this disposition, I am ready to acknowledge that it has amply atoned for it by the magnanimity and patience it has since exhibited. I also made the charge of personal indecorum. I thought that it really existed. I thought it indecorous for any gentleman to tell other gentlemen that they had personal knowledge of dishonorable intrigue practised on a late important occasion. As to the imputation of Senatorial authority, I am still of opinion that this charge is merited by gentlemen who say we must take this resolution precisely as it came from the Senate, or lose everything. I conclude what I have to say on this subject, by declaring that, whatever warmth I may have exhibited in this debate, the vote which I am now about to give is the result of the coolest deliberation, and in conformity to the most sincere dictates of conscience.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said, that they had been told the other night, by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) that it was necessary to procrastinate this decision in order to give time for that thorough investigation which it was then contended had not taken place. From the promise which was held out on that occasion, and from the time which had intervened, his expectations had been wound up to a very high pitch; whether they had been gratified or not he would leave the House to determine. Since the gentleman had expressed a desire, and the House had affirmed it, that this discussion should be protracted, Mr. R. hoped that he, on this subject, (whatever might be the ease on others, where he was compelled to defend what it was his duty to originate,) had occupied as little of their time as most of those who had discussed it, and might be permitted to make a few remarks in reply to those which had fallen from gentlemen.

He would begin with those of the worthy member from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVRIST.) He has stated that this amendment embraces three objects: The designation of the persons voted for as President and Vice President; the mode in which the choice of President should be made by that House, in case of no election by the Electors, in the first instance; and the provision that the duties of President should be exercised by the Vice President, if the House of Representatives should also fail to make an election. To the first of these provisions, the gentleman from Massachusetts felt himself warmly attached, but could not be brought to adopt it, when combined with the other two. On the first objection which he had taken, the gentleman had dwelt so short a time, and with so little force, and the difference between electing out of "the five highest," or out of those "having the highest numbers not exceeding three," was, in itself, so trivial, that little reliance seemed placed upon it. The possible succession of the Vice President to the Presidency, appeared to form the chief obstacle, and because he conceived it calculated to defeat the discriminating principle he could not be prevailed upon to assent to any amendment into which it was incorporated. And yet against this very principle of designation, the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. R. GRISWOLD) has made his utmost exertions, as subversive of the original ground of compact between the States. Let me ask, said Mr. R., upon what ground these gentlemen will vote together against this amendment when their views of its tendency are so entirely opposite, and when they are equally opposed in opinion as to what ought to be effected by us. I beg, sir, this inquiry may be understood to proceed from the high respect in which I hold the gentleman from Massachusetts, and from the regret which I must always feel in being compelled to act against him. It is dictated only by my anxiety to add the sanction of his character and his talents to every measure in which I may be concerned. The gentleman from Massachusetts advocates the discriminating between the persons voted for as President and Vice President; the gentleman from Connecticut deprecates it. The first gentleman is opposed to the amendment because it is calculated to defeat this principle of discrimination; the second because it contains it. When these gentlemen assigned such opposite and irreconcilable objections, I hoped they would not unite their votes against the amendment—that one of them would become a convert to the other, and that we should derive some support from them on the question. But there is one point on which they agree. They contend that it does not become us to suppose that the House of Representatives can refuse to obey the imperative voice of the Constitution, which commands them to elect a President, and that the provision of the Senate for such an emergency contains at once an unwarranted imputation on that branch of the Legislature, and an inducement to them to swerve from their duty. The supposition that this House will refuse to make an election when it is enjoined upon them by the Constitution, is said to be degrading, and therefore inadmissible. We are exhorted not to libel ourselves on our own statute book, and a late case is adduced to prove that all fears on that head are groundless. From that case I draw directly an opposite inference. Gentlemen then told us, we are highly averse to both the persons from whom we are to select a President, but there are shades in our dislike; we conceive that we have a right to be indulged with the candidate whom we consider the least obnoxious to our principles and views. If a mere shade of dislike between two persons whom they highly disapproved would warrant such an opposition as we then saw, what would have been the struggle if the choice had been to be made between the gentleman who succeeded to the Presidency, and either of those who were held up for that office from Massachusetts or South Carolina? Does any man believe that we should have succeeded in an election under such circumstances? Would the gentleman from Connecticut have abandoned his principles in that case, or does he expect that we should have surrendered ours?

I put it to the gentleman himself whether he could under such circumstances have relinquished his own judgment and principles. I ask if he could have justified to himself the giving of such a vote? I answer for him that he could not. I take upon me to say so, because I could not have justified it in myself. I never could have justified myself, because the House of Representatives are directed to choose a President, in abandoning a candidate for whom I had the highest confidence, and voting for one of whom I felt the greatest diffidence. The Constitution enjoins it upon this House to make an election, but it cannot enjoin upon any man an abandonment of his judgment and his principles. When we have conscientiously given our votes we have discharged our duty. It is equally our business to pass laws and to perform other important functions. But does that imply an obligation on any man to vote for laws which he believes impolitic, oppressive, or unjust? If the case which I have put had actually occurred, I presume we should have broken up without an election. For one I do not hesitate to say, that I would have continued balloting till the 4th of March, and let things take their course.

Let us suppose such a case to have happened. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects that the provision discriminating between the President and Vice President will be totally defeated, since the Vice President, chosen either by the Electors or the Senate, will succeed to the Presidency. Is it not better that a person selected by the Electors, who are apprized of the contingency, or by the Senate out of two presented to their choice, should succeed to the Presidency, than that anarchy should ensue, or desperate measures be resorted to for carrying on the Government? Will it not serve to diminish the violence of the conflict here, when this House is apprized that it does not rest with a party within its walls to defeat the election of President altogether? But this we are told will give rise to endless intrigue. The Vice President, if any, or candidate for that office, will use every means to prevent an election, in hopes of succeeding to the Executive power. Do gentlemen reflect that this argument equally applies to every case of election by the House, as the Constitution now stands? Is it not as easy for a candidate for the Presidency to intrigue, in order to effect an election, as for a Vice President to intrigue to defeat one? When two or more men come into this House as candidates for the office of President, are not their inducements to intrigue as strong as any which can exist under the proposed amendment, and is not the event of an election by the House of Representatives much more probable under the present than under the proposed amendment?

To vote for two persons, without designating which is intended for the President and which for Vice President, is, we are told by the gentleman from Connecticut, to insure the selection of the two most capable men in the United States for those offices, respectively; but if a discrimination be made, combinations will take place between the States, and the Vice President will become a weight to secure the election of President; that he will be selected rather with a view to the State of which he is a citizen, or to his influence with particular Electors, than his worth or abilities. So far is this from being true, in my opinion, that a designation is absolutely necessary to secure the election of a fit person for the office of Vice President. When the Electors designate the offices and persons, respectively, for whom they vote, after choosing the person highest in their confidence for President, they will naturally make choice of him who stands next in their esteem for Vice President; but where they are not permitted to make this discrimination, they will, to secure the most important election, give all their votes to him whom they wish to be President, and scatter the other votes; thus leaving to chance to decide who shall be Vice President. Where a discrimination takes place, the Vice President will necessarily be a man standing high in the public confidence. Where it does not take place, it is more than probable that he will be a secondary character. But we are told that it is degrading in the lowest degree to suppose that there is but one person in the United States equal to the Presidency. Far be this idea from me. Were I of this opinion, weak as I am, I should expect to survive the Constitution—since I may reasonably expect to survive the term of the present Chief Magistrate. But whilst I admit that there are hundreds capable of filling the office, I do not believe it possible to present to the public, or to an individual, two candidates between whom there will not exist a preference. This is the nature of man, and it is the nature of free Governments to gratify this preference.

But the gentleman from Connecticut has gone into a wide field. He takes a view of the elementary principles of our Government, which he states to be consolidating and federal, and he declares that the discrimination attempted to be introduced will violate the last of those principles, to which he professes himself particularly attached. It is a matter of some surprise to me that, agreeing so nearly as we do in general principles, we should differ so widely in our conclusions. With some variation of expression, (perhaps of ideas,) I subscribe to his general doctrine. With him, I consider this a Government of States—as a Federal Government. Inasmuch as it tends to consolidation, by so much is it objectionable to me.—With him, I prize the federal principles on which it is founded, and I will join that gentleman, or any other, in heightening every federal feature of the Constitution. I consider it, too, not only a Government of States, but as a compromise between States of various dimensions and interests. When embarked in one common bottom, with a common sword and common Treasury, it became necessary to give the large States a superior degree of influence, to induce them to put their superior wealth and population at the disposal of the Confederacy; whilst the small States were to be secured against encroachment. While, therefore, they are equal in the Senate, on this floor the States are represented in proportion to their population and wealth—their influence in the choice of President is compounded of their influence in both branches of the Legislature. This is the basis of the Constitution, and carries compromise in every feature. I will venture to say, that even this House is not organized on the principle of a consolidated Government, because the representation on this floor is not of the whole mass of the people of the United States, but it is a representation of each State. The United States are not divided into as many districts as there are members, nor is there a general election, but each State sends its own delegation; and the rule of apportionment of representatives is an additional proof that this is a federative Government and a Government of compromise. If I were to point out the part of this Constitution which tends most to consolidation, I should lay my hand on the Judiciary. The giving to that department jurisdiction not only under Federal laws, but in cases between man and man, arising under the laws of a State, where one of the parties is a foreigner, or citizen of another State, and even between citizens of the same State under the bankrupt system, is the strongest feature of consolidation in this Government. I will go all lengths with gentlemen in abrogating this jurisdiction—in restoring the federal principle to this department of Government. I wish to see the day when the jurisdiction of the Federal courts shall be confined to cases arising under the Federal laws.

Mr. R. apologized for the digression into which he had been carried by the view which the gentleman from Connecticut had taken of the principles of our Government. It is contended that the discriminating principle of this amendment goes to destroy the compromise between the States, since it will annihilate the power of the small States. To this I conceive it is an unanswerable reply that if such be its effect it can never become a part of the Constitution.

Five States may put their veto upon it. Rhode Island, Delaware, Ohio, Tennessee, and Georgia, are five as small States as can be found in the Union. They belong to the great subdivisions of the country, Eastern, Middle, Western, and Southern. These five States, judging from their representation, contain less than one-twelfth of the population of the United States. Eleven-twelfths of the Union may be forbidden by these States from adding this amendment to the Constitution. An additional proof that this proposition is not injurious to the smaller States is, that the Representatives of those very States have expressed their approbation of it. If, on the contrary, as has been contended by other gentlemen, this amendment impairs the influence of the large States, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and North Carolina, will reject it. But a strong proof that it neither affects the interest of the one nor the other is, that objections have been made to it on both these grounds. Whilst, however, the gentleman from Connecticut combats this discrimination as subversive of the rights of the small States his friend from Maryland (Mr. DENNIS) objects to it because the last provision renders nugatory the discriminating principle. Does the gentleman mean to disarm his friends of their objections to the amendments and induce them to support it; or does he, relying on their stability, expect to excite alarm in its friends and thereby defeat it? The gentleman and his friends have uniformly opposed all discrimination, and now it seems, he objects because that object is likely to be defeated. This objection the gentleman from Connecticut had, with his usual clear sightedness, cautiously avoided. He knew better the real bearing of the amendment, and if such had been the effect of the last provision, the amendment would never have received so strenuous an opposition from him. No sir, it is because he sees this principle, so obnoxious to him, existing unimpaired in this amendment, that he has thrown every obstacle in his power against it. He has indeed taken the objection that it will open the door to intrigue—for so soon as any man is put in reach of the Presidency you arm him with the power, whilst you give him the disposition to corrupt the Electors. It will therefore be the interest of the Vice President to defeat an election by this House. But will not the disposition and power to intrigue be equally brought into action as the Constitution now stands, when two or more candidates shall be presented to that House for their selection? And is not the probability of such an event diminished by discriminating between the officers? I conceive this provision, by lessening the chance of an election by this House, has done much. It will tend in a great degree to strengthen the union of these States, which never was more endangered than at the last election. The gentleman from Connecticut complains that the events of that period have been grossly misrepresented. Whether that be the case or not, I have no hesitation to state that it was, in my opinion, a period of imminent danger to this country. It was a crisis such as I hope we shall never again be exposed to, and to avoid its recurrence is my motive for advocating the amendment which has been sent to us, and which is as unexceptionable as any which I believe at this time attainable. The worst that can befall us will be the exercise of the duties of President by the same person who would be called upon to discharge them in case of his death, resignation, or removal from office.

Mr. EUSTIS.—If at this late hour I could expect the attention of this House, I should derive a peculiar satisfaction in replying to the observations of my friend from Virginia; and as from present indications I have a right to experience that indulgence, I shall proceed with the same candor which has distinguished the remarks of that gentleman, with whom it would be my pleasure to act on this as on other occasions.

That gentleman expresses his hope, as the resolution under consideration embraces the great object had in view, that those who are desirous of attaining this object will not refuse their assent to it because the resolution contains other provisions which he terms of an inferior or secondary nature. It is necessary to review the resolution, and I must repeat the objections which were made when it first came under consideration. I stated at that time that it differed widely and materially from the resolution sent up by this House to the Senate, and on which it does not appear that the Senate have acted. That resolution contemplated a single object, viz: a designation of the persons voted for as President and Vice President. The resolution of the Senate I also stated to consist of three distinct and separate propositions: the first containing what has been termed the designating principle; the second reducing the Constitutional number of candidates from whom the House of Representatives are to choose, in case there be no choice by the Electors, from five to three; the third providing in case there shall be no choice by the House of Representatives, that the Vice President shall be President of the United States. The first provision, that of designating, appears to me, and the House will recollect, and the gentleman from Virginia will also recollect, that I then stated this to be a modification rather than a change of a Constitutional rule or principle, by which the votes of the Electors, given in that case as they are now given under the Constitution, will be subject only to this alteration, that the person voted for as President, and the person voted for as Vice President, will be respectively designated in distinct ballots. This is the alteration contemplated in the resolution which passed the House—this embraces the whole of the change contemplated by the House and by the public—this is the amendment which I continue to approve, and against which I have heard no substantial objection.

The second amendment proposed by the Senate, it may also be recollected, was objected to on two grounds: first, that it contemplated another important alteration in the Constitution in a point where no evil had resulted, and where no inconvenience had been experienced. Without any reason, it proposed to narrow the choice of the House from five to three. It has been contended—and I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will take this as an answer to his observations—it has been contended by that gentleman, as well as others, and with some ingenuity, that the President and Vice President are to be chosen from the five highest candidates, by the Constitution; and as, by the resolution, the President is to be chosen from the three highest, and the Vice President from the two highest, that the three and the two make five, and of course there is no difference; and the gentleman, therefore, does not see how the resolution can be objected to on this ground. But it will be seen that at present, and under the Constitution, the President is chosen from five; if the proposed amendment be adopted, he must be chosen from three candidates; making a change, and narrowing the choice from among the candidates, from five to three. The election of Vice President, by this amendment, is totally changed; he is to be chosen at another time and in another place, and gentlemen must see that his election bears no relation to, and cannot be coupled with, that of the President.

The second objection to this amendment was grounded on the indefinite mode of expression—"from the persons having the highest numbers, 'not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately by ballot.'" There is a want of precision in these words. Some gentlemen understand it as limiting the choice to the three highest candidates, while others suppose them intended to embrace five, ten, or fifteen, if there be so many having an equal number of votes in the three highest grades; and, if gentlemen on this floor differ in their construction, is it not to be expected that the State Legislatures, when they come to consider, and the House of Representatives of the United States, when they come to act under it, will also differ?

The third proposition provides that, if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President before the fourth of March following, the Vice President shall act as President, as in case of his resignation or death—another and a still more important change in the Constitution. To this I did object, and I do still object, because it is predicated on a concession which I am not willing to have ingrafted in that instrument. It is predicated on a presumption that the House of Representatives may refuse to carry into effect the public will—that they will refuse to obey the imperative language of the Constitution, which ordains that, in case there be no choice by the Electors, they shall immediately proceed to a choice; because it assails a first and fundamental principle—it presumes on a privation or absence of political morality, on which all our institutions rest. The Constitution cannot exist if this principle become extinct.

The formation of this House—which is the democratic branch of the Government—how is it effected? In apportioning the representation of the several States, the words of the Constitution are,—“The State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to three Representatives.” Suppose the people of the State of New Hampshire had declined to choose their Representatives, has this House the power to compel that State to exercise this right? They have not; and if other States had, from whatever motives, pursued a similar course, this House could not have been formed, and the Constitution must have been defeated.

A sense of interest and of political obligation are the basis and the security of the Constitution, and distinguish the people and Government of this from those of other countries; if you presume on its absence, you discourage, you diminish, you destroy it. “If the House of Representatives shall not choose.” The House of Representatives will not refuse, they will not dare to refuse; the transaction which is passed proves they dare not defeat the will of the people. But if you make this amendment you furnish them with an apology, with an excuse, with a justification for refusing; and, what is worse, you tempt them to refuse; you presume, at least, that they may refuse. The high responsibility imposed on the House by the Constitution is destroyed. This provision will be pleaded in justification of their refusal to make a choice; and when they shall refuse what is to be the consequence? The officer whom it is intended to be defeated, by the first resolution, is promoted; the man whom the people never intended should be President, the Vice President, becomes President of the United States. The Vice Presidency will thenceforth become the office of importance to be secured in the Government, and by the means, and with the temptation, which will be in his power to offer and to use, he will finally become President.

I am sensible this is a provision in a last resort, and which cannot take effect excepting in case of a failure of two other processes: that of the Electors first, and that of the House in the second instance; and I am also sensible that the three provisions for securing a President stand separate from each other; but it is true, and it will be found in practice, that they have each a relation to, and bearing on the other. The responsibility of the Electors will be diminished, the House of Representatives will feel less responsibility, encouragement will be given to intrigue, and the means which have been, perhaps, too often alluded to on this floor, will receive a facility in the hands of the person who shall be chosen Vice President, which may become dangerous to the public peace and destructive to the public happiness.

These are the objections which I made to the resolution under consideration: a review of the subject has not diminished them. We continue to approve the designating principle—we approve the number five of candidates from which the House is to make a choice when the election shall be brought there. My friend from Virginia was with us in opinion on these points; our affirmative vote is on the Journals; if there be any change of opinion, that change is not with us, it is the majority of the House who have changed. And what reason is assigned for the change? What is the reason assigned by the gentleman from Virginia? That this is the best or the most he can attain, or that, as he gains the discriminating principle, he is willing to take the two other amendments which the Senate have added. We ask to be satisfied that we are reduced to this alternative. It is not satisfactory to be told that the Senate will not recede when they shall be made acquainted with the objections of the House; we ask for an intercourse with them—we desire that the rules of procedure in ordinary business be observed in this. With this view, I moved yesterday that the resolution might be committed; that we might send a message to the Senate, asking an answer to the proposal made to them for their concurrence in the resolution which passed the House, or to propose a committee of conference. The motion was negatived—it was said not to have been a custom in this Government to send such an order or message. Without pretensions to much experience, I know it must be in order. I know it must be consistent with parliamentary rule to send messages of this nature. In what other manner is the sense of one House to be made known to the other? On a subject of this importance, where there appears a difference of sentiment in the two Houses, some intercourse ought to be had, and some explanation is required. Perhaps the Senate, when they shall become possessed of the objections of the House, will be willing to recede from one or both the alterations which they have made in our resolution. When we ask them to institute this inquiry, gentlemen rise in their places and tell us, the Senate will not recede; and this is all we can have—this is not satisfactory.

By what means can gentlemen know this? It is due to those who object, and it is due to the House, that the inquiry should be made, that the ordinary course should be pursued. The resolution in the meantime will remain in custody of the House, and if there shall be a conviction that the Senate will give up nothing for the sake of accommodation, it may finally be adopted; until this course shall have been pursued it is unreasonable to press a decision. Many gentlemen who approve of the designating principle are opposed to the amendments proposed by the Senate. Some of those gentlemen have expressed their disapprobation; some of them will be compelled to vote against the resolution if insisted on at this time.

On the subject of amendments generally, two of my colleagues have expressed sentiments not founded in a knowledge of the letter or spirit of the Constitution. One of them, a reverend gentleman, (Mr. TAGGART,) speaking of the constitution of Massachusetts, ascribed great wisdom to the framers of that instrument, because they had provided that it should not be amended until after the expiration of fifteen years; that within that term an insurrection had prevailed in the State, and if the constitution had admitted of being amended or altered at that time, the temper and disposition of what he has called the public mind were such as would have cast the State afloat on the ocean of anarchy. Sir, that worthy gentleman is not acquainted with the constitution of his own State. That constitution is bottomed on the principle that the people have at all times a right to alter, to amend, and change their form of Government, whenever their own interest or their own happiness shall in their opinion require it.

Impressed with this principle, the framers of that constitution provided by an express article that the General Court which should be in session fifteen years after the adoption, "shall issue precepts to the several towns and plantations, calling a convention in order to take the sense of the people, whether they wished for any alteration." Understanding their own constitution, and knowing that they have at all times the right to alter and amend it, the people of the State have rested easy under it without alteration.

With respect to the Federal Constitution, are gentlemen ignorant of the difficulty with which the convention of Massachusetts finally adopted it? Do they recollect that amendments were for a long time insisted on as a condition of the ratification; that the people of that State having gone through the war under a federative Government very different from this, were afraid of the powers granted by the new Constitution; that their fears were extensive and influential; and that this Constitution was finally adopted, because it carried with it the means of being altered and amended as time and experience should suggest, and because the State Legislatures as well as Congress had a right to institute amendments?

One of the gentlemen (Mr. THATCHER) has quoted an authority to which every member of this House will bend with respect and attention. But the passage he has quoted, makes directly against him. Whilst we are cautioned against alterations under the garb of amendments, we are invited to adopt such as "experience" shall recommend, and the object of this amendment so far as it respects the designating principle is suggested by experience; that the true way to preserve the affections of the people for this Constitution is, to recur to the principles and conditions with which it was adopted, and instead of objecting, to give facility to such amendments as experience shall suggest.

When Mr. EUSTIS had concluded, the question was taken, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, two-thirds of the members present concurring in their agreement to the said resolution of the Senate, to wit—yeas 83, nays 42—and Mr. SPEAKER declaring himself with the yeas.

The House proceeded to consider a motion of the second instant, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to discontinue the office of Commissioner of Loans in the several States."

THURSDAY, December 15.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled "An act to authorize the sale of the frigate General Greene, and a further addition to the naval armament of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The said bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill giving effect to the laws of the United States within the territories ceded to the United States by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the supplementary report of the Committee of Claims, of the thirteenth instant, on the memorial of Paul Coulon, a French citizen; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That there be paid to Paul Coulon, as Agent for the captors of the ship Betty Cathcart, and brig Aaron, prizes to the privateer La Bellone, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of six thousand two hundred and forty-one dollars and forty-four cents, being the amount retained by the Treasury Department from the sales of the ship Betty Cathcart, for duties on the cargo of the brig Aaron.

FRIDAY, December 16.

A message was received from the Senate stating that they had passed the salary bill, with sundry amendments—also that they had resolved to postpone till the first Monday of September, the amendment to the Constitution sent to them by the House of Representatives.

[This is the amendment, in lieu of which the amendment agreed to by the two Houses was passed.]

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Paul Coulon; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Wednesday next.

TERRITORY OF LOUISIANA.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill giving effect to the laws of the United States, in the territory ceded by France to the United States.

The amendment of Mr. LATTIMORE, having for object the preservation of a port of entry in the Mississippi Territory, was again taken into consideration.

Mr. LATTIMORE moved that the Committee should rise, to allow further time for obtaining information.

This motion was supported by Messrs. LATTIMORE and SANDFORD; and opposed by Messrs. J. CLAY and J. RANDOLPH; and lost—yeas 48, nays 50.

Messrs. LATTIMORE, GREGG, SANDFORD and GRISWOLD, then spoke in favor of the amendment; and Messrs J. RANDOLPH, S. L. MITCHILL, J. CLAY, EUSTIS, MACON, and VARNUM against it. When the question was taken on it and carried in the negative—yeas 25.

Mr. LYON offered a motion to exempt from duty goods exported from Louisiana, to the ports of the United States, since the twenty-second day of October last.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. J. RANDOLPH and J. CLAY, and rejected without a division.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill with several amendments, which the House immediately considered; and agreed to with other amendments, when the bill was ordered to a third reading on Monday.

MONDAY, December 19.

A memorial of the House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory of the United States,

DECEMBER, 1803.

Louisiana Territory—Mail Routes.

H. OF R.

signed by William Dunbar, their Speaker pro tempore, and attested by Richard S. Wheatly, their Clerk, was presented to the House and read, stating certain disadvantages to which the inhabitants of the settlement on the Tombigbee and Alabama rivers have been and are now subjected, in consequence of their remote situation from the other inhabited parts of the said Territory; and praying that a line of separation may be drawn between the settlements on the Mississippi river, and those of Washington district, or that judges, learned in the law, may be appointed to reside within the said district, for the benefit and convenience of the inhabitants thereof.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the committee appointed, on the twenty-fifth ultimo, on the petition and memorial of sundry inhabitants of the District of Washington, situate on the Mobile, Tombigbee, and Alabama rivers, in the said Mississippi Territory; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

TERRITORY OF LOUISIANA.

An engrossed bill giving effect to the laws of the United States within the territories ceded to the United States by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes, was read the third time: Whereupon a motion was made, and the question being put, that the said bill be recommit- ted to the consideration of a Committee of the whole House, it passed in the negative. And then the main question being taken that the said bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 13, as follows:

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act fixing the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned:" Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said amendments, together with the bill, be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

MAIL ROUTES.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the following report of the Post Office Committee:

The Committee on the subject of the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred a resolution of the 2d ultimo, directing them to inquire by what means the mail may be conveyed with greater security and dispatch than at present, between the City of Washington and Natchez and New Orleans, report—

That the late cession of Louisiana by France to the United States renders it an object of primary importance to have the nearest and most expeditious mode of communication established between the City of Washington and the city of New Orleans, the capital of that province; not only for the convenience of Government, but to accommodate the citizens of the several commercial towns in the Union.

That at present the mail is conveyed on a circuitous route from this place to Knoxville and Nashville in Tennessee, and from thence through the wilderness by Natchez to New Orleans, a distance of more than 1500 miles.

That, by establishing a post route as nigh on a direct line between those two cities, as the Blue Ridge and Alleghany Mountains will admit of, will not only lessen the distance about 500 miles; but as this route will pass almost the whole way through a country inhabited, either by citizens of the United States or friendly Indians, the mail will be more secure, and the persons employed in transporting it better furnished with the means of subsistence.

The committee flatter themselves that the views of the General Government, in effecting this important object, will be seconded by the governments and citizens of those States through which this road will pass, by laying out, straitening, and improving the same, as soon as the most proper course shall be sufficiently ascertained; but as this has not heretofore been used for conveying the mail between those places, they presume that the best route will be better known after it has been used for this purpose, than it can be at present; and with this view of the subject, they deem it improper at this time to designate intermediate points; they are, therefore, of opinion—

That a post road ought to be established from the City of Washington, on the most direct and convenient route to the Tombigbee settlement in the Mississippi Territory, and from thence to New Orleans.

And further, that a post road ought also to be established from the said Tombigbee settlement to the Natchez. This road will not only afford the inhabitants of that place a direct mode of communication with the seat of the Territorial Government, who at present are destitute of any, but will shorten the distance between this city and Natchez nearly three hundred miles. And for the consideration of the House, the committee submit the following resolution

Resolved, That a post road ought to be established from the City of Washington, on the most direct and convenient route, to pass through or near the Tuckabatchee settlement to the Tombigbee settlement in the Mississippi Territory, and from thence to New Orleans; and also from the said Tombigbee settlement to Natchez.

Mr. STANFORD moved the insertion of the following words:

"And Carter's Ferry on James river, Cole's Ferry on Stanton, Dansville on Dan river, in Virginia; Salisbury, Beatty's Ford, on Catawba, in North Carolina; Spartanburg, Greenville Courthouse, and Pendleton Courthouse, in South Carolina; and Jackson Courthouse, in Georgia."

His object being to designate the intermediate points of the route between the seat of Government and New Orleans and Natchez.

This motion was supported by Messrs. STANFORD, J. RANDOLPH, EARLY, EARLE, and MACON, on the principle that it was proper that Congress should designate the route, and on the ground that the route contemplated by the amendment would be the fittest.

On the other hand, the motion was opposed by Messrs. THOMAS, SMILIE, HOLLAND, CLAIBORNE, S. L. MITCHILL, and G. W. CAMPBELL, on the ground that a discretionary power should be reposed in the Postmaster General to designate the route; and on the ground that, if Congress should undertake to designate the route, the one fixed by the amendment was not an eligible one.

Mr. DENNIS declared himself in favor of the House exercising the power of designating the route, but was not sufficiently informed to vote on any particular line.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD moved that the Committee of the Whole should rise and ask leave to sit again, with the view that leave should be refused, and the report recommended to the Post Office Committee, in order to obtain from them a detailed report, that would furnish the House with satisfactory information.

This motion was supported by Mr. GREGG, and opposed by Mr. THOMAS, and carried—yeas 70.

The House then refused leave to the Committee of the Whole to sit again—yeas 19, and re-committed the report to the Post Office Committee.

TUESDAY, December 20.

Mr. ALSTON presented a memorial from sundry inhabitants of the Indiana Territory, praying a repeal of the sixth article of the ordinance establishing the Indiana Territory, which prohibits slavery in said Territory.

Mr. VARNUM objected to the reference of the memorial on the ground that its prayer was both unconstitutional and unjust.

Mr. ALSTON replied that this remark might be an argument against agreeing to the prayer of the memorial, but would not apply against making the reference, especially as the same subject was already referred to a committee on another petition.

The reference to a committee was carried—yeas 48, nays 34.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire whether any, and, if any, what description of claims against the United States are bound by statutes of limitation, which in reason and justice ought to be provided for by law, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHILL, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who were directed by a resolution of this House of the ninth ultimo, "to inquire and report by bill, or otherwise, whether a drawback of duties ought not to be allowed on sugar refined in the United States, and exported to foreign ports or places," made a report thereon.

Ordered to lie on the table.

ZACHARIAH COX.

Mr. EARLY called for the order of the day on the report of the Committee of the Whole on the petition of Zachariah Cox.

The House took up the report, which is, that the prayer of the petitioner cannot be granted.

Mr. EARLY hoped the report would be disagreed to, in which case he would move the following resolution:

Resolved, Although the arrest and confinement of Zachariah Cox, by Winthrop Sargent, Esq. appears to have been illegal and oppressive, yet that the circumstances are not such as to justify the interposition of this House.

Messrs. R. GRISWOLD and SMILIE opposed the adoption of this motion, on the ground that it involved a decision on the character of a public officer on ex-parte evidence; that if Governor Sargent had abused his power, he was a fit subject of impeachment, and that this would be the becoming course to pursue; and that inasmuch as he might be brought before a court of justice, it was highly improper and unjust to impose a stigma on his character, which might operate injuriously to the course of justice.

Messrs. EARLY and J. RANDOLPH advocated the adoption of the motion, on the ground that Governor Sargent appeared, from documents which he had himself transmitted to the Department of State, to have made an illegal and oppressive arrest and confinement of the petitioner, for which act he was, in their opinion, impeachable; but inasmuch as the power of impeachment was a high and solemn one, which ought not to be cheapened by an application to trifling cases; and inasmuch as it was the general opinion of the House that this was a case that did not merit such interposition, it became proper, at the same time, to avoid a decision, that might appear, in a side way, to extuluate Governor Sargent, which might be considered as the effect of confirming the report, that the prayer of the petitioner cannot be granted.

On concurring in the report of the committee, viz: that the prayer of the petitioner cannot be granted, the House divided—yeas 54, nays 26.

This decision of course superseded the motion contemplated to be made by Mr. EARLY, in case the report of the committee should have been disagreed to.

DECEMBER, 1803.

Salaries of certain Officers.

H. OF R.

SALARIES OF OFFICERS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the amendments of the Senate to the salary bill. These amendments were:

1. To strike out these words, "as established by the act passed the second of March 1799, and no other."

2. To increase the salary of the Postmaster General from $3,000 to $4,000.

3. To increase the salary of the Assistant Postmaster General from $1,700 to $2,000.

4. To insert a new section, prohibiting the allowance of any extra compensation, from contingent funds, to officers compensated by fixed salaries.

The Committee disagreed to the three first amendments, and agreed to the last.

The House immediately took up the report of the Committee, and concurred in it.

On a concurrence with the Committee on their agreement, to the last amendment, the yeas and nays were taken—yeas 56, nays 42, as follows:

NAYS—Nathaniel Alexander, Silas Betton, John Campbell, Thomas Claiborne, Joseph Clay, John Clapton, Jacob Crowninshield, John Davenport, John Dawson, John Dennis, William Dickson, Thomas Dwight, John B. Earle, Peter Early, James Elliot, Calvin Goddard, Thomas Griffin, Gaylord Griswold, Roger Griswold, Samuel Hammond, Seth Hastings, David Hough, Benjamin Huger, Samuel Hunt, Michael Leib, Joseph Lewis, jun., Thomas Lowndes, Matthew Lyon, Nahum Mitchell, Thomas Moore, Thomas Plater, John Rhea of Tennessee, Tompson J. Skinner, John C. Smith, William Stedman, James Stephenson, Samuel Taggart, Samuel Tenney, Samuel Thatcher, George Tibbits, Abram Trigg, and Lemuel Williams.

WEDNESDAY, December 21.

The report received yesterday, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who were directed by a resolution of this House of the 5th ultimo, "to inquire and report, by bill or otherwise, whether a drawback of duties ought not to be allowed on sugar refined in the United States and exported to foreign ports or places," was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Paul Coulon. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House an account of the money received for the support of sick and disabled seamen; designating particularly the sums collected and expended at each port.

On motion of Mr. CLAIBORNE, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what description of claims against the United States are barred by the statutes of limitation, which, in reason and justice, ought to be provided for by law; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. CLAIBORNE, Mr. TENNEY, Mr. VARNUM, Mr. STANTON, Mr. TALLMADGE, Mr. CHITTENDEN, Mr. PATTERSON, Mr. SMILIE, Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. SANDFORD, Mr. WINSTON, Mr. DICKSON, Mr. CASEY, Mr. MERIWETHER, Mr. MORROW, Mr. LATTIMORE, and Mr. GRAY, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

On motion, it was

Ordered, That Mr. PURVIANCE and Mr. VERPLANCK be added to the committee appointed, on the eighteenth of October last, "to inquire, and report, by bill or otherwise, whether any further provisions are necessary for the more effectual protection of American seamen."

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the committee appointed "to inquire and report whether any further provisions are necessary for the more effectual protection of American seamen," do inquire into the expediency of granting protections to such American seamen, citizens of the United States, as are free persons of color; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. DENNIS observed that he was one of those who had long been of the opinion that the existing duties paid on certain imported articles ought to be either taken off or reduced. He considered the situation of the country such as would now justify a reduction. He, therefore, moved a resolution, declaring it expedient to reduce the duty on brown sugar to one cent per pound, and enjoining it on the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill for that purpose.

Ordered, To lie on the table.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to incorporate the Directors of the Columbian Library Company.

Mr. J. CLAY moved an amendment to limit the term of incorporation to fourteen years. Motion lost—ayes 25.

After making a few verbal amendments, the Committee rose and reported the bill, and the House ordered it to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. STANFORD moved an instruction to the Post Office Committee, to inquire into the most convenient route, designating the same, for the mail from Washington to New Orleans.

Agreed to without a division.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill, received from the Senate, to sell the General Greene, and to make an addition to the Navy.

Mr. EUSTIS moved an additional section, allowing rations to half-pay officers, subject to Navy orders, provided they are not employed on board of merchant vessels, or otherwise engaged in transacting their personal affairs.

This motion was supported by Messrs. EUSTIS, NICHOLSON and CLAY; and opposed by Messrs. MACON, SMILIE, GREGG, and CLAIBORNE; and on the question being taken, was agreed to—yeas 52, nays 44.

Mr. MACON moved to strike out the second section of the bill, which authorizes the President, in case the public exigency shall require it, to cause to be built or purchased two small vessels of war, appropriating therefor $50,000.

This motion was supported by Messrs. MACON,

The motion for the rising of the Committee was carried—yeas 52 nays 42. The House then gave the Committee leave to sit again—yeas 48, nays 45.

SALARIES OF OFFICERS.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, jun., from the managers appointed the twenty-third instant, on the part of this House, to attend a conference with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act fixing the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned," made a report thereon.

The House then proceeded to consider the said report, together with the message this day received from the Senate; and the same being twice read the question was taken, that the House do agree to the resolution contained in the said report of the conferees appointed on the part of this House, in the words following, to wit:

Three other members, to wit: EBENEZER ELMER, JOHN SLOAN, and HENRY SOUTHARD, from

New Jersey, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the House.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That no person or persons claiming, under an act of Georgia, any part of the territory lately ceded by Georgia to the United States, shall be entitled to receive compensation from the Government, for any real or pretended loss they may have sustained in consequence of that cession, if they have, subsequent to the acts under which they claim, withdrawn from the treasury of Georgia any moneys deposited as a consideration. Mr. LUCAS, from the committee to whom was committed, on the eighth instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate Governments," reported that the committee had had the said bill under consideration, and agreed to a report thereupon; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was read, and, together with the bill, ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, jun., from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented, according to order, a bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, during the year one thousand eight hundred and four; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

An engrossed bill for the relief of John Coles was read the third time and passed.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE PICKERING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee, of the twenty-seventh instant, appointed on the twentieth of October last, to prepare and report articles of impeachment against John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, who was impeached by this House, during the last session, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

Mr. TENNEY called for the reading of several depositions; which, being read, Mr. T. said he had called for their reading to show that Mr. Pickering had sustained a respectable character, and that his recent conduct had arisen from insanity. For this reason, he thought the articles of impeachment should not be agreed to by the House.

Mr. NICHOLSON replied, that, at the last session, the House had determined that they would impeach John Pickering. It became therefore their duty at this time to furnish the Senate with the articles. Whether John Pickering was insane or not, it was not for him to decide; but he was clearly of the opinion that the insanity stated by the gentleman from New Hampshire proceeded from constant and habitual intoxication. This information he had obtained from the most respectable sources. After the last session, Mr. N. said, when he perceived the charges made in some public prints against the House of Representatives for impeaching a man laboring under insanity, he had made it his business to inquire into this fact; in consequence of which, he had received information by letter from several respectable men in New Hampshire, stating that the Judge was under the influence of habitual intoxication. It was also stated, in the deposition of the marshal, that the last time the Judge was on the bench, he went directly from a grog-shop, and was in a state of intoxication.

The report was agreed to, without a division.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, the articles were ordered to be enrolled, in correspondence with the practice of the House.

Also, on motion of Mr. NICHOLSON,

Ordered, That eleven managers be appointed on the part of this House.

Mr. JACKSON moved that the managers should be appointed by the Speaker.

The motion was supported by Messrs. SMILIE, FINDLEY, and THATCHER; and opposed by Messrs. DENNIS, MITCHILL, and GREGG. It was negatived.

It was then moved that the appointment should be made by ballot.

This motion was supported by Messrs. R. GRISWOLD, S. L. MITCHILL, GREGG, ELLIOT, HOLLAND, G. W. CAMPBELL, DENNIS, SKINNER, BEDINGER, and SANDFORD; and opposed by Messrs. SMILIE, NICHOLSON, and ALSTON, who advocated an appointment by votes given viva voce.

The question being put, it was, without a division, resolved that the appointment should be by ballot. The first ballot was postponed till Monday.

MONDAY, January 2, 1804.

Two other members, to wit: ADAM BOYD and JAMES MOTT, from New Jersey, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the House.

A memorial and petition of William Henry Harrison, Governor of Indiana Territory of the United States, was presented to the House and read, stating that much inconvenience has arisen, and does daily arise, to the citizens, from the want of money in the Territorial treasury to answer the exigencies of the Government; and praying that a law may pass authorizing the requiring of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, or other persons employed to issue licenses to Indian traders within the Indiana Territory, to receive for each license issued such a sum, for the use of the said Territory, as in the wisdom of Congress may be deemed reasonable and proper.

Ordered, That the said memorial and petition be referred to Mr. EPPES, Mr. ELMER, and Mr. LIVINGSTON, with leave to report thereon by bill, or bills, or otherwise.

Mr. S. L. MITCHILL, from the committee appointed on the twenty-sixth ultimo, presented a bill for reprinting the laws of the United States, and for the more extensive distribution of the same; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE PICKERING.

The enrolled articles of impeachment against John Pickering were read and signed by the Speaker.

The House proceeded to elect by ballot eleven managers. Mr. NICHOLSON and Mr. R. GRISWOLD acted as tellers. One hundred and nine ballots were given—fifty-five making a majority.

For Mr. Nicholson, 104; for Mr. Early, 89; for Mr. Rodney, 81; for Mr. Eustis, 71; for Mr. R. Griswold, 70; for Mr. J. Randolph, 70; for Mr. S. L. Mitchell, 61; for Mr. G. W. Campbell, 60; for Mr. Blackledge, 57; for Mr. Boyle, 46; for Mr. J. Clay, 37; for Mr. Newton, 35; for Mr. Varnum, 30; for Mr. Elliot, 25; for Mr. Holland, 21; for Mr. Smilie, 19; for Mr. Huger, 14; for Mr. Thatcher, 13—with other scattered votes. Of which gentlemen, the first nine, having a majority, were declared to be elected.

The House then proceeded to ballot for the two remaining managers—Mr. R. GRISWOLD and Mr. J. RANDOLPH acting as tellers. Eighty-eight votes were given—forty-five constituting a majority.

For Mr. Boyle, 72; for Mr. J. Clay, 59; for Mr. Varnum, 12; for Mr. Newton, 12; for Mr. Elliot, 7—with other scattered votes. The two first, having a majority, were declared to be elected.

Mr. GRISWOLD begged to be excused from serving as a manager, and stated as a reason that he was already on several committees; and he was excused accordingly.

The House then proceeded to a third ballot. Seventy-nine votes were given—forty constituting a majority.

For Mr. Newton, 26; for Mr. Elliot, 19; for Mr. Varnum, 19; for Mr. Thatcher, 12; for Mr. Dana, 2; for Mr. Findley, 1. No choice.

The House then proceeded to a fourth ballot. Eighty ballots were given—forty-one constituting a majority.

For Mr. Newton, 49; for Mr. Elliot, 14; for Mr. Mott, 14. Mr. Newton, having a majority, was declared to be elected.

[In the above ballots, several votes given for Messrs. Randolph, Mitchell, Campbell, and Clay, were not counted, owing to there being other gentlemen of similar names in the House.]

The eleven managers elected are, therefore, as follows: Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Early, Mr. Rodney, Mr. J. Randolph, Mr. Eustis, Mr. S. L. Mitchell, Mr. G. W. Campbell, Mr. Blackledge, Mr. Boyle, Mr. J. Clay, and Mr. Newton.

A motion was made and seconded that the House do now adjourn; and, on the question thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 53, nays 29, as follows:

TUESDAY, January 3.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting an annual account of the fund established for defraying the contingent charges of the Government. The Message and account were ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House sundry depositions and other papers transmitted from the town of Fayetteville, in the county of Cumberland, and State of North Carolina, respecting a contested election of Samuel D. Purviance, one of the members returned to serve in this House, for the said State; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House, to be exhibited in the name of themselves, and of all the people of the United States, against John Pickering, in maintenance of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors, be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, to inform them that this House have appointed managers, on their part, to conduct the impeachment against John Pickering, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by the House, to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against the said John Pickering; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and four; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with several amendments, which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to authorize the Secretary of War to frank all letters, returns, and other papers on public service, transmitted from the office of the Paymaster and Inspector of the Army; and directing that all such letters, returns, and papers, transmitted to the offices of the Inspector and Paymaster shall be addressed to the War Department:

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the Committee appointed, on the eighteenth of October last, to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made in the acts establishing a post office and post roads within the United States.

A petition of sundry freeholders of the counties of Knox, St. Clair, and Randolph, in the Indiana Territory of the United States, was presented to the House and read, praying the confirmation of certain donation lands granted by a former Congress, and submitting certain propositions to the consideration of Congress, relative to the location and settlement of lands of the United States within the said Territory, and to other objects therein specified, which they pray may be adopted by Congress, for the convenience and benefit of the petitioners, and other inhabitants within the said Indiana Territory.—Referred.

Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was recommended, on the twenty-second ultimo, their report on a motion relative to a provision for the relief of the owners of the Danish brigantine Henrick, together with sundry accompanying documents, made a supplementary report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

On motion of Mr. LEIB, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy do report to this House a statement of all the moneys advanced for the pay, clothing, subsistence, and contingencies, of the Corps of Marines, from the time of the organization and establishment of that corps to the close of the last year; exhibiting the dates of the advances, and to whom made; also, an account stating, generally, under each head of expenditure aforesaid, when, and by whom, and what amount of money has been accounted for; and showing the balance, if any, now in advance and not accounted for.

Mr. HUGER, from the committee to whom was referred, on the fifteenth of November last, the report of a select committee, made at the last session of Congress, on the subject of the fisheries of the United States, with instructions to inquire and report whether any, and if any, what measures are necessary for the encouragement of the whale and cod fisheries, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. KENNEDY called up his resolution, prescribing that the sums received in the ports of the United States, for the relief and maintenance of sick and disabled seamen, be expended in the districts wherein they are collected, and that the surplus be placed for certain purposes under the direction of the President.—Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday.

Mr. J. CLAY observed, that considerable injury had accrued to the United States from the existing provisions of the revenue laws in cases wherein they were infringed. He therefore moved the following resolution :

Resolved, That persons guilty of crimes arising under the revenue laws of the United States, or incurring fines or forfeitures by breaches of the said laws, may be prosecuted, tried, and punished, at any time within five years after the time of committing the offence or incurring the fine or forfeiture ; any provision of law to the contrary notwithstanding :

Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, transported by land, in the cases therein mentioned.

The Committee, after some discussion of the bill, rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Courts of the United States to appoint Commissioners to administer oaths to appraisers ; to take the depositions of witnesses out of Court ; and to enforce the attendance of such witnesses as may be summoned to appear before the Commissioners so to be appointed.

Ordered, That Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. ROGER GRISWOLD, and Mr. THOMPSON, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

LIGHT-HOUSE DUTIES.

Mr. MITCHILL observed, that there had been some conversation in the House during the last session, concerning the sums of money paid by our merchants on foreign voyages. He wished to renew that subject, as well worthy of the attention of Government.

Foreign nations levy money upon our vessels, which frequent their ports, for the purpose of supporting their light-houses. The sums paid by our merchants in compliance with these exactions are very considerable. The contribution which strangers are thus obliged to make, constitutes a fund, that goes a great way towards defraying the expense of those establishments, to the great relief of their own subjects.

The average amount of light-money paid by every vessel that enters a British port, is about four pence sterling the ton, for every light she may have passed inwards, or that she may be expected to pass outwards. Calculating by this rule an American ship of two hundred and eighty-four tons, entering the port of London, is charged with duties for the maintenance of the following lights, all along up the British channel, to wit : Scilly, Longships, Lizard, Eddystone, Portland, Caskets, Needles, Owers, Dungenness, Foreland, Goodwin, and the Nore. They amount to thirty-four pounds sterling, and the stamped paper for the receipt four pence more. Besides this, the duties of the Trinity House, for such a ship, amount to nine pounds, seven shilling and eight pence. In addition to which there is demanded and paid, by virtue of an act of George III. for the maintenance and improvement of the harbor of Ramsgate, seven pounds and two shillings. So that the amount of these impositions for light-money and Ramsgate harbor money, on a ship under three hundred tons, for a single voyage to London, amounts to fifty pounds and ten shillings sterling, which is equal to two hundred and twenty-two dollars, independent of her tonnage, duties on merchandise, pilotage, and other expenses.

An American vessel entering the harbor of Hull, the lights are charged as before, viz : Scilly, Longships, Lizard, Eddystone, Portland, Caskets, Needles, Owers, Dungenness, Forelands, and Goodwin ; and to these are added the lights on the Eastern coast of England, such as Sunk, Harwick, Gatt, Lowstoft, Harbro, Winterton, Oxford, Shawl, Dudgeon, Faulness, and the Spurn. The amount of these demands for light-money on an American ship of two hundred and forty-five tons is thirty-seven pounds and six shillings sterling. At Hull, the collector enforces payment of Ramsgate harbor duties to the amount of £6 2s. 6d., and of Dover harbor dues to the amount of £3 1s. 3d. The demand for supporting lights, few of which perhaps were seen on the passage, and for improving harbors which were not entered by the ship, amount to forty-six pounds nine shillings and nine pence sterling on a burthen less than two hundred and fifty tons. An amount of demand exceeding two hundred and four dollars.

An American ship goes to Liverpool, she is charged for the light up St. George's Channel. A ship of three hundred and fourteen tons is made to pay for supporting the lights at Milford, that called the Smalls, and another known by the name of Skerries. These several demands, with the price of stamps, come to £15 14s. 2d. sterling on a vessel of that burthen for one voyage, or more than sixty-three dollars for light-money alone. For each of these three light-houses the charge is exactly four pence sterling the ton.

Light-houses have been established by the Government of the United States on many parts of our extensive coast. Many parts of it are admirably illuminated. And the whole expense of these valuable establishments is defrayed from the Treasury out of the ordinary income. Foreigners who visit our ports participate the security and advantage of these guides to mariners, as fully as our own citizens ; but they pay nothing for this privilege of directing themselves by our lights. Foreign nations have acknowledged the principle that duties ought to be collected from their commercial visitors, for supporting light-houses, and they compel our merchants to pay them. It is a correct principle of distributive justice, that we should cause our commercial visitors to pay something also for the establishment and improvement of our light-houses. A duty of tonnage, for this express purpose, could easily be laid and collected from foreign vessels, and would add materially to our means of keeping them in good repair and attendance. A sum for example, of six or seven cents per ton upon every foreign vessel for every light-house she shall have passed, will make a valuable fund for the humane and excellent institution of light-houses. To the intent that this interesting subject may be investigated and that our Government may avail itself of its own proper rights and resources, I move the following resolution:

"That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire into the expediency of laying and collecting a tonnage duty on foreign ships and vessels, entering the ports and harbors of the United States, for an equivalent for the advantages which such ships and vessels derive from the light-houses they pass, inwards and outwards."

WEDNESDAY, January 4.

A message from the Senate informed the House that, the Senate will, at twelve o'clock this day, be ready to receive articles of impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, to be presented by the managers appointed by this House.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and four, was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, during the year one thousand eight hundred and four; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with several amendments, which were twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

The House proceeded to consider a motion of the third instant, relative to "the expediency of laying and collecting a tonnage duty on foreign ships and vessels entering the ports and harbors of the United States, as an equivalent for the advantages such ships and vessels derive from the light-houses they pass, inwards and outwards;" and the said motion being twice read and amended at the Clerk's table, was agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire into the expediency of laying and collecting a tonnage duty on ships and vessels entering the ports and harbors of the United States, as an equivalent for the advantages such ships and vessels derive from the light-houses they pass, inwards and outward; and report their opinion thereon by bill, or otherwise.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to extend the time making the oath required in cases of goods, wares, and merchandise, exported and entitled to drawbacks, and therein to amend the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of imports and tonnage;" and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with an amendment, which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said bill be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the managers appointed on the part of this House, to conduct the impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, reported that the managers did, this day, carry to the Senate the articles of impeachment agreed to by this House, on the thirtieth ultimo; and the said managers were informed by the Senate that their House would take proper measures relative to the said impeachment, of which this House should be duly notified.
8th Con.—26

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL offered a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire whether any, and if any what, alterations are necessary to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontier.

Ordered to lie on the table.

ADDITION TO THE NAVY.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate for the sale of the General Greene, and for making a further addition to the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the motion under consideration when the Committee rose was, to strike out the second section of the bill, which provides for the building or purchase of two small armed vessels, and appropriates therefor $50,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON observed that since this subject had been before the Committee he had made it his business to inquire into the existing necessity for the two small vessels contemplated to be added to the Navy. He had learned, from authority in which he reposed full confidence, that two such vessels might at present be advantageously employed, but that one of them was indispensably necessary. Sensible of the large demands upon the Treasury, though his opinions remained unchanged, he would agree, in case the honorable Speaker (Mr. MACON) would waive his motion, to strike out the whole section, or in case they should negative it, to a provision being made for one vessel instead of two, and to a reduction of the sum appropriated to $25,000.

Mr. MACON (Speaker) expressed his regret at his inability, holding still the same sentiments he had on a former occasion avowed, to comply with the wishes of the gentleman from Maryland.

A debate of some length ensued on the motion of Mr. MACON to strike out the second section.

MESSRS. SMILE and J. RANDOLPH supported the motion. They contended that no necessity existed in the present situation of the United States for an augmentation of the Navy; that it remained in the same state it had been fixed in during March, 1801, with the addition of four small vessels for the Mediterranean service; that it had heretofore proved fully competent to the protection of commerce, even when the complexion of our affairs was less pacific than at present; that the Mediterranean service had evinced that large vessels produced in that quarter more decisive effects than small ones, and that of the former description of vessels we had a sufficient number unemployed; that one great occasion for small vessels was removed by the permission of the State of South Carolina to import slaves, which superseded the necessity of any additional force to restrain their illegal admission into the United States; that this addition to our marine force did not appear to be necessary, inasmuch as the President, whose Constitutional duty it was to give information to Congress of the state of the Union, and who directed the armed force of the nation, had not intimated his opinion of its necessity; and that Congress might be sure, if he thought it necessary, he would not hesitate to apprise them of it; that in adopting this provision of the bill the House was acting altogether in the dark, as no estimates of the expense had been furnished, and not even a committee appointed to examine either the propriety or expense of the measure. It was alleged that it became the Legislature, in the present posture of the national finances, to be uncommonly circumspect. New and heavy pecuniary obligations had been incurred, and time alone could show whether the present resources would be more than commensurate to meet them. That the Secretary of the Treasury, at the opening of the session, had spoken of the competency of our resources with a caution which ought to impress the House with the necessity of exercising strict economy, unless disposed to vote new taxes. To this point, this measure manifestly tended, and it became those who were hostile to new taxes, to hesitate before they adopted a measure that promised to lead to it.

The motion was, on the other hand, opposed by Messrs. NICHOLSON, EUSTIS, R. GRISWOLD, and HUGER. They observed that the bill under consideration had received the sanction of the Senate, and it might be rationally presumed that they had previously to its passage received satisfactory proof of its necessity; that the first section authorized the sale of the frigate General Greene, in the lieu whereof it was contemplated to build or purchase two small ships; that this measure therefore constituted no increase of the Navy beyond its present strength; that so far as related to expense, whatever the temporary cost, arising from the building or purchase might be, the permanent expense of two small vessels would be greatly inferior to that of one large one; that the annual expense of a forty-four gun frigate was $104,000, while that of a vessel of sixteen guns was only $36,000; that with regard to the argument of gentlemen drawn from a want of estimates, it was idle, as estimates had been furnished at the last session, as the basis of adding four small vessels for the Mediterranean service, which amounted to $96,000, which sum appeared to be sufficient. If, therefore, four vessels cost $96,000, two would not cost more than $50,000; that with regard to the necessity of these ships, Congress were the proper and Constitutional judges; that it was their special duty to provide and maintain a navy, and to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; and that the absolute dependence placed by gentlemen on Executive mandates was unprecedented, anti-republican, and unconstitutional; that it became the Legislature to judge for themselves as to the propriety of the measure; that from the knowledge they possessed of the state of the country, and the extended sphere of commerce, abundant evidence was presented of its necessity. It was a fact well ascertained that, for Barbary warfare, these small ships were eminently useful, and that service required relief; for in case of a disaster occurring to one of our present small vessels, it was proper to be provided with others that might promptly make good the deficiency. That the acquisition of Louisiana would undoubtedly require some naval force to insure the collection of the revenue in that quarter; and that the state of the West Indies absolutely demanded an addition of some small vessels to protect our trade from the barges that were fitted out by the brigands for the purposes of depredation; that it was a fact that if the Executive, at this moment, possessed one of these ships, it would be immediately sent to the West Indies; that there were other important purposes for which these vessels were wanted. The Government had frequent occasion to send special Envoys, on points of vast importance, to the two great Powers in Europe. Was it then safe, or becoming the dignity of the nation to send such characters, in a private merchantman subject to the search or capture of any armed vessel of Europe?

Before a question was taken on the motion to strike out the section, Mr. JACKSON moved that the Committee should rise. If they rose he would oppose their having leave to sit again, with the intention of referring the bill to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The Committee agreed to rise; ayes 63.

Leave having been refused to them to sit again, Mr. J. RANDOLPH moved that a committee be appointed to inquire whether any and what, further additions may be necessary to the Naval Establishment of the United States.

Mr. ALSTON moved to amend the motion by striking out "a committee be appointed," and inserting "the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed." Messrs. ALSTON, NICHOLSON, and EUSTIS, supported, and Mr. J. RANDOLPH opposed this amendment. Carried, yeas 51, nays 46.

The motion thus amended was supported by Messrs. HUGER and ELMER, and opposed by Messrs. VARNUM and SMILIE. Carried, yeas 57, nays 44.

Mr. JACKSON then moved the reference of the bill to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures. Agreed to without a division.

THURSDAY, January 5.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, during the year one thousand eight hundred and four, was read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the committee appointed, on the twelfth ultimo, "to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alteration is necessary to be made in the law regulating the mode of selecting jurors to serve in the Courts of the United States," have leave to report thereon by bill, or bills, or otherwise.

JANUARY, 1804.

Official Conduct of Judge Chase.

H. OF R.

Mr. EARLY, from the committee last mentioned, presented, according to order, a bill directing the mode of selecting jurors to serve in the Courts of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

PRINTING OF LAWS.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for reprinting the laws of the United States.

Mr. JACKSON moved to strike out the first section.

A motion was made that the Committee should rise, on account of the absence of the chairman of the committee that brought in the bill, (Mr. MITCHILL.)

This motion was supported by Messrs. R. GRISWOLD and HOLLAND, and opposed by Messrs. SMILIE, JACKSON, and NICHOLSON.

Before the question was put, Mr. MITCHILL entered the House, when it was taken, and the motion rejected—ayes 47, noes 54.

The motion to strike out the first section recurring, Mr. MITCHILL spoke at some length on the expediency of reprinting the laws; but suggested the propriety of suffering the bill to rest until the next session.

Mr. JACKSON withdrew his motion to strike out the first section, and moved that the Committee should rise, with the view of postponing the bill to the next session.

This motion, after debate, was carried—ayes 67. The Committee were then refused leave to sit again.

Mr. JACKSON moved a postponement of the bill to the first day of December next.

Mr. THOMAS opposed the postponement. In case the motion to postpone should be negative, he said he would move the recommitment of the bill to a Committee, with a view to empower the Secretary of State to distribute the laws in the Territory of Louisiana.

The motion to postpone was rejected—ayes 47, noes 52.

Mr. THOMAS's motion was then agreed to—ayes 60.

Mr. DENNIS offered a motion directing the Secretary of State to transmit to each member of Congress a copy of the laws of the antecedent session.

Referred to the above Committee.

OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF JUDGE CHASE.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said, that no people were more fully impressed with the importance of preserving unpolluted the fountain of justice than the citizens of these States. With this view the Constitution of the United States, and of many of the States also, had rendered the magistrates who decided judicially between the State and its offending citizens, and between man and man, more independent than those of any other country in the world, in the hope that every inducement whether of intimidation or seduction which could cause them to swerve from the duty assigned to them might be removed. But such was the frailty of human nature that there was no precaution by which our integrity and honor could be preserved, in case we were deficient in that duty which we owed to ourselves. In consequence, sir, of this unfortunate condition of man, we have been obliged, but yesterday, to prefer an accusation against a judge of the United States who has been found wanting in his duty to himself and his country. At the last session of Congress a gentleman from Pennsylvania did, in his place, (on the bill to amend the Judicial system of the United States) state certain facts in relation to the official conduct of an eminent judicial character, which I then thought, and still think, the House bound to notice. But the lateness of the session (for we had, if I mistake not, scarce a fortnight remaining) precluding all possibility of bringing the subject to any efficient result, I did not then think proper to take any steps in the business. Finding my attention however thus drawn to a consideration of the character of the officer in question, I made it my business, considering it my duty, as well to myself as to those whom I represent, to investigate the charges then made, and the official character of the judge, in general. The result having convinced me that there exists ground of impeachment against this officer, I demand an inquiry into his conduct, and therefore submit to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to report their opinion whether the said Samuel Chase hath so acted in his judicial capacity as to require the interposition of the Constitutional power of this House.

After the motion made by Mr. J. RANDOLPH had been read from the Chair,

Mr. MITCHILL said, before the question was taken, he should be glad, from the novelty and serious nature of the proposed measure, to hear a statement by his friend from Virginia of the reasons in detail on which it was founded.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH observed, that when he was up before he had stated that the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMILIE) had, in his place, at the last session of Congress, given a description of the official conduct of the officer to whom the resolution referred, which he considered the House bound to notice. It could not be conceived that the gentleman would have laid before the House a statement, the facts of which were not supported by his own knowledge, or by evidence on which he could place the utmost reliance. He did not conceive this to be a time to decide whether the information exhibited by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was or was not correct. At present an inquiry alone was proposed. If it should be made, it must result either that the conduct of the judge would be found to be such as not to warrant any further proceedings on the part of the House, or such as would require the interposition of that authority, which, as the immediate Representatives of the people, they alone possessed. If on inquiry the committee shall be persuaded that the judge has not exceeded his duty; they will so report; if, on the contrary, they find it such as to require the interposition of the House, they will recommend that course of proceeding to which the House alone is competent. With respect to the facts which had come to his knowledge, Mr. R. said that they were such as he did not wish to state. He preferred its being done by witnesses, who were most competent to do it correctly.

Mr. ELLIOT said, I am as deeply convinced as the gentleman from Virginia that the streams of justice should be preserved pure and unsullied. I am also sensible that the Judicial department ought to attach to itself a degree of independence. I am of opinion that this House possesses no censorial power over the Judicial department generally, or over any judge in particular. They have alone the power of impeaching them; and when a judge shall be charged with flagrant misconduct, and when facts are stated which shall induce them to believe those charges true, I shall be at all times prepared to carry the provisions of the Constitution into effect, in virtue of which great transgressors are punishable for their crimes. The basis of this resolution is, that a gentleman from Pennsylvania, at the last session, stated that the judge named in it had been guilty of improper conduct. Of these charges I am uninformed, and every new member must be uninformed. It is astonishing to me that we are called upon to vote for an inquiry into the character of a judge without any facts being adduced to show that such an inquiry should be made. If the resolution pass in its present form, it appears to me that we shall thereby pass a vote of censure on this judge, which neither the Constitution nor laws authorize. If the judge be guilty, I should suppose the first step proper to be taken would be for some person aggrieved, or for members having personal knowledge, to exhibit facts on which the House may act. I can never consent, because the gentleman from Virginia, or any other gentleman, says that there are facts which have come to his knowledge that induce him to think an inquiry ought to be instituted, to vote for it, unless those facts are first stated. I can never agree to any act which shall in this manner, without the exhibition of proof, impose censure or suspicion on a judge. This course may be perfectly Parliamentary; but it strikes me as altogether unprecedented. I shall, therefore, until some facts are adduced, resist every attempt to impose a censure upon the conduct of any public officer.

Mr. SMILIE.—If the gentleman from Vermont had commanded a little patience, he would have perceived the remarks which he has just made to have been altogether unnecessary. He would have perceived the necessity imposed upon me by the observations of the gentleman from Virginia of stating those facts to which that gentleman alluded. It must be seen that these proceedings contemplate the possibility of an impeachment. It will be recollected by gentlemen who were in Congress at the last session, that I was then led to give a statement of facts respecting the conduct of Judge Chase on a particular occasion. That statement was not made with a view to impeachment. A bill had been introduced to change the districts of the circuit courts of the United States; when I discovered that Mr. Chase was assigned to the district of Pennsylvania, I felt interested in having him transferred to another district, considering that his previous conduct had rendered him obnoxious to the people of that State. These circumstances I stated to the House, and was in consequence called upon to assign my reasons why Judge Chase was obnoxious to the people of Pennsylvania. This is the history of the business so far. I am now called upon to state the facts which I mentioned on that occasion. This I shall do briefly.

A man of the name of Fries was prosecuted for treason in the State of Pennsylvania. Two of the first counsel at that bar, Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas, without fee or reward, undertook his defence. I mention their names to show that there could have been no party prejudices that influenced them. When the trial came on, the judge behaved in such a manner that Mr. Lewis declared that he would not so far degrade his profession as to plead under the circumstances imposed upon him. Mr. Dallas declared that the rights of the bar were as well established as those of the bench; that he considered the conduct of the judge as a violation of those rights, and refused to plead. The facts were these: The judge told the jury and the counsel that the court had made up their minds on what constituted treason; that they had committed their opinion to writing, and that the counsel must therefore confine themselves to the facts in the case before the court. The counsel replied that they did not dispute the facts, but that they were able to show that they did not constitute treason. The end of the affair was, that the counsel retired from court, and the man was tried without counsel, convicted, and sentenced to death.

After this the Attorney General wrote a letter to Messrs. Dallas and Lewis, requesting them to furnish their notes and opinions for the use of the President. They drew up an answer, in which they stated that the acts charged against Fries did not amount to treason, but were only sedition; and that they were so considered in the British courts. This letter was read to me by Mr. Dallas. After receiving the letter the President pardoned the man.

Mr. J. CLAY.—This debate appears to me to arise from causes the most extraordinary, and such as we are not accustomed to hear assigned on this floor. The gentleman from Virginia has made a motion justified by his own knowledge as well as that of my colleague; and this motion is opposed in a most extraordinary manner. I believe this is the first instance in which a motion to appoint a committee of inquiry into the official conduct of a public officer has been opposed. We are told by the gentleman from Vermont that this House has no right to pass a censure on a judge, and that judges should be highly independent. I am afraid that unless great care be taken the doctrine of judicial independence will be carried so far as to become dangerous to the liberties of the country. This motion does not, however, affect the character of the judge. Let it also be recollected, that if the reputation of the judge be at stake, the reputation of this House also is implicated. I consider this House as the Constitutional guardians of the morality of the Judiciary. Whenever even suspicion exists as to that morality, a committee of inquiry should be appointed. For the pure administration of justice is surely more important than the reputation of any particular judge. I am sorry my colleague thought it necessary to make any statement of facts to the House. I believe that more important facts than he has mentioned will be stated by witnesses. I believe likewise the reputation of the judge will be better preserved by the appointment of a committee than by assertions made on this floor by particular members, not responsible elsewhere for what they allege.

With regard to my opinions in this case, whatever my political impressions may be, they are entirely unbiassed. I have heard facts stated, but I cannot say that they have been satisfactorily proved to my mind. There are other charges equally reprehensible. Under these circumstances I ask if the character of the judge is not more implicated by a discussion of his official conduct on this floor than by appointing a committee to obtain facts. If he is guilty of the facts alleged against him, no gentleman will say that he is not impeachable. If he is only suspected of them, there ought to be a committee, that if guilty he may be impeached, and if innocent, be freed from the imputation thrown upon him.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD.—Gentlemen will acknowledge that this is a subject of great importance and delicacy. No one will doubt but that we ought to execute our duty so as to preserve the fountains of justice pure, and that we ought at the same time to treat the important character of a judge, or of any other high officer, with respect. I do not know but that this mode of procedure is warranted by precedent. But if it is, it is unknown to me. As the resolution now stands, I do not think it perfectly correct. The honorable gentleman from Virginia says he is acquainted with facts that warrant the proposed inquiry. The question is whether the House ought to be governed by the opinions of any one member. We know not what those facts are; the gentleman declines stating them. I do think, as the subject now strikes me, that the conviction of any one member of the propriety of this measure cannot warrant the interposition of the House. Instead of taking the individual opinion of a member, it ought to be stated that certain facts exist, which, if proved, will justify an impeachment. I do not know whether these ideas are not incorrect, having never before contemplated, or had a suspicion that such a motion would be made.

As to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I do not consider them as entitled to much weight. If the facts stated by him were of his personal knowledge, they would undoubtedly merit attention. But he merely states that which he has received from others, and which amounts to nothing more than that the judge refused liberty to the counsel to argue a point of law after it was decided, and confined their argument to facts. In so doing, the judge may have erred, but it was an error of judgment for which he cannot be impeached. No lawyer will perhaps say that it was not the province of the judge to decide the law, and that he has not the right to prevent counsel from arguing it after his mind is made up. But this information is not of the knowledge of the gentleman. Are we then to institute an inquiry into the conduct of a high officer of the Government merely on hearsay? This has never been done under our Government. In the late case of Judge Pickering proof was furnished by the affidavits of witnesses testifying certain facts. I do not therefore consider it correct to proceed to inquire on the opinion of any gentleman. The proper course is first to have proofs which will justify ourselves to our own consciences in making the inquiry—for we ought not to touch the character of a judge, unless we are satisfied from facts that there is good reason for an investigation into his conduct. Gentlemen will not say that making an inquiry into the official conduct of a judge does not touch his character.

Gentlemen say if this committee find the conduct of the judge to have been correct, they will make a report to that effect; but it does not follow that the report will contain all the evidence adduced, and suspicion may still rest on the character of the judge, and that some facts may not be stated, which, if stated, would show his misconduct. Whereas if the business be brought generally before the House, on the exhibition of certain facts, the public will be enabled to decide whether they warrant impeachment or even suspicion. With this view of the subject, I am of opinion that it will be best to delay acting in this affair until facts shall be disclosed which will justify the step now proposed to be taken. I have as high a respect for the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia as for that of any other member on this floor; but I doubt whether we can justify our votes on the opinion of any single member; facts alone ought to govern our opinions. I, therefore, for the purpose of considering the course most proper to be pursued, move a postponement of the further consideration of the motion until to-morrow.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—Were I the personal enemy of the gentleman who is the object of this resolution, I should take precisely that course which, on this occasion, the gentleman from Connecticut seems more than half inclined to take. That gentleman wishes the resolution to lay until to-morrow, in order that he may have time to consider whether he can bring himself to refuse the inquiry altogether. He says that he cannot, or rather (for he speaks doubtfully) he thinks he cannot see the propriety of instituting an inquiry without evidence. What evidence? Nothing short of legal proof—testimony on oath. And what is the object of the resolution? To acquire that very evidence. If we had the evidence, to what purpose make inquiry? As however the evidence cannot be had without inquiry, and the gentleman will not grant the inquiry but upon the evidence, it is plain that if we take the course which he recommends, we must go without both. Will gentlemen offer objections against inquiry which are applicable only to impeachment? If an impeachment were moved, they would have a right to call for evidence. But what is the object of the present motion? Merely to inquire whether there exists evidence which will justify an impeachment. But this inquiry we are told cannot be instituted on mere hearsay, although we have the declaration of a member in his place. What would be said of a grand jury, who being informed by one of their body that A or B could testify to the fact of a murder being committed within their jurisdiction, should refuse an application to the court to have them summoned, and because they could not find a bill of indictment unsupported by evidence, should reject that evidence which might be within their reach? I profess not that tenderness of conscience which has been displayed by the gentleman from Connecticut. My conscience teaches me to accuse no man wrongfully, but to deny inquiry into the official conduct of no one, however exalted his station; and I had supposed, from his practice, that the gentleman held the same opinion. For it will be recollected that on the eve of the close of the last session he had himself instituted an inquiry which went to impeach the conduct of some of the first officers of the Government. No one on that occasion stepped in between the demand for an inquiry and those officers implicated in it? No inquiry was made, and it precluded any further proceeding on the part of the House, since the charges which had been attempted to be brought forward would not bear examination. Mr. R. concluded by calling for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GREGG said he should vote against the postponement and in favor of the resolution. The case was somewhat new, but he perceived no impropriety in giving it the same direction with all the other business originated in the House. What is this committee to be appointed for? To investigate facts and report them to the House. Was it not most proper that gentlemen whose characters were implicated should have, in the first instance, facts stated privately before a committee, than that parts of their character should be immediately brought into view before the House? He recollected one fact not yet alluded to in debate. In 1792, after the army under the command of General St. Clair was defeated, great dissatisfaction arose, and the character of the commander was implicated. The idea was that the expedition had not been conducted with propriety. The business was brought before Congress. It was understood at that time, whether justly or not, Mr. G. would not pretend to say, that the commander-in-chief could not be tried by a court martial. Congress therefore took up the business, and appointed a committee of inquiry, who went through a lengthy examination of the subject. Mr. G. mentioned this precedent that gentlemen might turn their attention to it.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD said—I had hoped that the language used by me, when I was up before, would not have led gentlemen to suppose that I was acting as the friend or the enemy of Judge Chase. I am acting in neither capacity. I am acting only as a member of this House, who ought to be anxious on an occasion of such importance to take that course which is most consistent with propriety; that course which results from the duty this House owes the nation, and that duty which they owe the character of a judge. It did appear to me that it was not correct to call the character of a public officer into question unless some necessity should first appear. No facts are presented on this occasion. The gentleman from Virginia has said that he is in possession of facts, or of something which makes him believe that an inquiry is proper, but he does not choose to communicate those facts. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has given us his information. The question is, whether it is proper on these light suggestions to institute a solemn inquiry into the character of this judge. It appears to me that we ought not to throw any imputation on the character of any officer without evidence that such an inquiry is necessary. The case mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GREGG) does not apply. Dissatisfaction existed in the country and in this House on the events of a campaign; an inquiry was instituted; but what was its object? The committee were appointed to inquire into the general causes of the failure of the expedition; they were not instructed to inquire into the character of a particular officer.

The gentleman from Virginia has referred to another case, when he says that we were ready enough to institute an inquiry, and has left it to be inferred that the inquiry was made without any previous proofs of its necessity. But certainly on that occasion inquiry was not made without proof. I suppose the inquiry alluded to was that which related to the conduct of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund. It was instituted on a report made by them, and which we thought was not satisfactory. The resolution offered was adopted, and inquiry was made, the result of which is well known to every gentleman. It follows, therefore, that there are no precedents adduced which apply to the present case.

It is my wish that the proceedings of this House may on this occasion be perfectly correct, and that we may not be precipitated into the adoption of this resolution without due consideration. If it is correct to vote an inquiry in all cases where a member rises on this floor and desires it, it is correct to vote it in this case. In this case a gentleman rises and says that he is satisfied an inquiry ought to take place. The question is, whether it is proper to inquire on the suggestion of a member? If it is proper without facts being adduced, then it will be always proper to inquire whenever any member requires it, and it will be also proper whenever any individual citizen requires it. This course I have never thought correct. On the contrary I think some facts ought to be previously presented to establish the necessity of an inquiry before it is voted. In the case of Judge Pickering a very different course has been pursued. The appointment of a committee of inquiry originated from a Message of the President. We find in February, 1803, the House received the following Message:

JANUARY, 1804.

H. OF R.

"The enclosed letter and affidavits, exhibiting matter against John Pickering, District Judge of New Hampshire, which is now within Executive cognizance, I transmit them to the House of Representatives, to whom the Constitution has confided a power of instituting proceedings of redress, if they shall be of opinion that the case calls for them."

This Message was referred to a committee, with the accompanying papers, furnishing evidence of the necessity of an inquiry. But the course pursued to-day is very different. A gentleman gets up, and moves an inquiry into the conduct of Judge Chase, and says that he is of the opinion that it ought to be made. This course, I think, is incorrect. Some facts ought first to be adduced. I repeat it, I am on this occasion neither the friend nor the enemy of Judge Chase. I am the friend of this House; I wish its proceedings to be correct, and I hope they will not do hastily what they may hereafter regret.

Mr. DENNIS.—The only question now before the House is, whether they will postpone the consideration of the motion on the table. I cannot but express my surprise that the gentleman from Virginia should oppose this motion, when several have declared that they are not prepared to vote on this resolution. Gentlemen ought to recollect that, according to our rules, on all motions which require the concurrence of the two Houses, one day's delay is necessary. Although this resolution is not of this kind, yet it surely is not of inferior importance.

I believe that the gentleman alluded to by the motion would rather court than shrink from an investigation of his official conduct. I believe, also, that it has become necessary, from the discussion of this day, that an investigation should take place. I am not, therefore, prepared at this time to say whether I shall not ultimately vote for an inquiry. But it appears to me that the course proposed is inverting the natural order of things, inasmuch as it institutes an inquiry not growing out of facts, but for facts. I believe also that the facts stated, if authenticated, will furnish no ground for impeachment. Circumstances attending this motion show that the gentleman from Virginia does not consider them as a sufficient ground for an impeachment. The refusal to hear the point of law discussed was the act of the court. Mr. Chase did not sit alone on the bench. Another judge must have been associated with and have concurred with him. If so, why does not the resolution allude to the other judge? Why select one judge, when both are equally implicated in the charges?

I believe the most parliamentary way would be for a gentleman to state, in the form of a resolution, the grounds of impeachment, and then to refer such a resolution to a select committee for investigation. In this mode the House may correctly institute an inquiry, and send for persons and papers. This is the only parliamentary mode of proceeding. In every case where impeachments have been made, the facts have been stated in a resolution, concluding with a motion for an impeachment. The House possess no censorial power over the judges, except as incidental to the power of impeachment. If gentlemen are possessed of facts, why not state them in the form of a resolution, and move an impeachment? Then, if the facts appeared to me to warrant an impeachment, I would not object to their going to a select committee, though I believe the most proper course would be for the House to send for persons and papers, and to examine for themselves. But it is extremely novel and unprecedented for the House, without facts, to institute an inquiry into the character of a high officer of the Government.

May they not, in the same way, extend their inquiry into the conduct of every judge in the United States, without stating any facts on which the inquiry is founded? For these reasons I shall vote for postponing the further consideration of this resolution for one day, on account of the importance and delicacy of the subject, and the serious deliberation it is entitled to. I do not know whether, if sufficient time is allowed for consideration, and I shall be convinced that this course is consistent with parliamentary usage, I shall not be in favor of an investigation.

Mr. ELLIOT.—When the yeas and nays are called, I shall on every occasion rise in favor of taking them. I wish the votes I give in this House entered on the Journal, and known to every citizen of America. The more I contemplate the course pursued on this occasion, the more extraordinary and unprecedented it appears to me. The gentleman from Virginia rose, and, after an elegant exordium, stating that the streams of justice should be preserved pure, and other fine things, told us that he had received information of facts that convinced his mind that an inquiry ought to be made into the conduct of a judge. Suppose the gentleman, on facts known to himself, had stated his opinion, that an inquiry ought to be made into the conduct of the President of the United States. We have the same right to impeach the President as a judge. If the inquiry would be improper in the one instance, without facts being adduced, it would be equally so in the other. For we possess no censorial or inquisitorial powers over the conduct of the judges of the Supreme Court. If Judge Chase has been guilty of misconduct, let it be stated. If that misconduct be of a private nature, let the House assume the character of a grand jury, hold private sittings, receive evidence, and determine whether the judge shall be impeached or not. The gentleman asks whether a grand jury in the case of a charge of murder can send for persons. Undoubtedly they can. But did gentlemen ever hear of their appointing a committee to inquire whether a man charged with a partial offence ought to be indicted? We are called on, as the grand inquisitors of the nation, to appoint an inquisitorial committee to get evidence; for it is granted that as yet we have none. I believe that no committee of this nature ought to be constituted, without previously ascertaining facts that will warrant the delegation of such great power. No accusation, even, is before us; but we are called upon to appoint a committee to look one up—a committee to be invested with power to send for persons and papers—a committee to inquire in private. I will never consent to the appointment of such a committee, until facts that will justify the inquiry are stated.

The facts adduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if proved, could not induce me to believe that the judge is impeachable. I may suspect that his conduct was erroneous and improper, but I cannot conceive it proper to impeach a single judge for the act of the court. Believing, therefore, this conduct unprecedented, unparliamentary, and replete with improprieties; believing it novel; believing that, in an affair of so much consequence, we ought not to proceed with precipitation; believing that we are entitled to demand one day to reflect upon it,—I am proud, on this occasion, to record my vote in favor of the postponement until to-morrow; and if it were for a week, I should with equal pride and pleasure vote for it.

Mr. HOLLAND moved an adjournment.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said, that considering a motion to adjourn equivalent to a postponement for a day, he moved the taking the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. HOLLAND moved an adjournment, on which the question was taken—yeas 52, nays 62.

The question of postponement recurring,

Mr. HUGER considered the course contemplated by the resolution as improper, unparliamentary, and unprecedented. To make up his mind on the course proper to be pursued, he was in favor of the postponement.

Mr. HOLLAND observed that he had moved an adjournment to allow those gentlemen time for reflection who had not yet made up their minds on the propriety of the motion. He was himself of this number. Having been allowed no time for reflection, he did not feel perfectly satisfied with the appointment of a committee of inquiry before any facts had been substantiated. Desiring further time to form his judgment, and seeing no occasion for precipitation, he should vote in favor of a postponement.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL.—I will not, at this late hour, detain the House with the expression of my ideas in detail. I am as desirous as any member of this House that the streams of justice should flow pure and unsullied, as on their purity depend the safety and liberties of the people of the United States. But when we are about to enter into measures for preserving them clear, we owe it to ourselves to preserve order in our conduct, and to act in such a manner as we shall be able to justify to our constituents. Every member of this House, on such an occasion, ought to be as cautious in his proceeding as a judge in delivering his opinions, lest, while we are condemning the conduct of the judge, we ourselves go astray from our duty. For this reason, I am against the adoption of a measure which may throw a censure on a character invested by the United States with high authority, until I am convinced we have sufficient ground for doing so. The resolution on the table can have but one object, to wit: the direction of an inquiry whether sufficient evidence can be procured to authorize an impeachment. I conceive that this House cannot proceed in any other way. I am therefore of opinion, that, before the vote for an inquiry, there ought to be probable grounds that facts exist that authorize an impeachment, and that evidence can be procured of their existence. I am not prepared to say, from anything which has been adduced, that such evidence does exist. I conceive that until probable grounds are shown, we ought not to authorize such a procedure, inasmuch as it may establish a precedent that we may hereafter regret—a precedent which will put it in the power of any member to move and obtain an inquiry into the conduct of the President, a judge, or any other officer under the Government. Under these circumstances, I am not prepared to say this is the regular course of proceeding. I do not profess to have much knowledge of parliament-any proceedings, and have therefore waited, before I expressed my opinions, to hear such precedents as gentlemen could adduce. Having heard none, I conclude none exist.

I conceive that the act of this House, in voting for a committee of inquiry, is equivalent to the expression of the opinion that they have evidence of the probable grounds of the guilt of the judge. The gentleman from Virginia has told us that the powers of this House are, in some degree, like those of a grand jury. I agree that they have all the powers of a grand jury, and it is on this ground that I deny the power now contended for. I say that a grand jury has no right to send for testimony: they have only a right to receive testimony from any one of their body, and to receive such witnesses as the court may send them. If, then, there be evidence in the present case, let us act upon it, even though it be ex parte, and although that might, perhaps, be going too far.

I repeat it, I have heard no statement satisfactory to my mind that there are probable grounds for proceeding in this business. It is true, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made a statement, but that statement appears to me to depend not so much on facts as on opinions; and it is not my wish to decide on the propriety of the conduct of the judge until the facts are before us. It is certain that a judge has a right to control counsel, and to say when his mind is made up, while it is also his duty to hear the allegations that shall be made.

In addition to these reasons for a postponement, I am also in favor of it, because, whenever a sincere desire exists to gain information, which can only be done by allowing further time, I shall always be in favor of it, when no material injury can result from the indulgence.

Mr. MORT.—I am in favor of the postponement, because I wish time for consideration, and because I am against the resolution itself. I think it is improper to go into such an inquiry before specific charges are laid before the House, when it will be proper for the House to consider whether those charges are sufficient to sustain an impeachment; then it will be proper to proceed, and not till then. No charges have yet been laid before the House: we have only been told by one member that he is satisfied sufficient grounds exist.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH was sorry to be obliged to trespass again on the patience of the House, but the direct application made to him by the gentlemen from Tennessee and South Carolina imposed upon him the necessity of stating his reasons for proceeding in what they were pleased to term so precipitate a manner. They ask, why not have laid the resolution on the table by way of notice to the House? Because, sir, I cannot in a matter of extreme delicacy make the opinions of other gentlemen the standard of my own actions. I should have conceived the character implicated in the resolution as having just cause of complaint against me, had I not been ready to decide in a moment on it, and did I not press its immediate decision. I should have deemed it an act of cruel injustice to have hung the inquiry over his head even for a day. I should have expected the reproach of setting suspicion afloat whilst I avoided examination into them; for I should have deserved it, had I pursued the course which gentlemen wish to adopt. I can see no difference between hanging up this motion for a day or a year but the mere difference of time. What is the object to be obtained? Do we wait for evidence, or any information, which will assist us in forming a correct opinion? Not at all. To-morrow the question will recur upon us—"Is it proper, from what has already appeared, to institute an inquiry into the conduct of this officer?" And this we are as competent to decide at this moment as at any future day. When, however, gentlemen consider a resolution to make inquiry the same as an inquiry already had, I am not surprised at finding myself opposed to them in opinion. I repeat that all their arguments are applicable to a motion of impeachment only. But it seems that no precedents have been adduced, and time is wanted to hunt them up. Gentlemen should recollect that but two cases of impeachment have taken place under this Government; one of a Senator from Tennessee, the other of a district judge of New Hampshire. By what precedents were the proceedings in those cases regulated? How is it possible in a Government hardly in its teens, where new cases must daily occur, as its various functions are called into exercise, to find precedents? It did so happen, in the case of the Senator from Tennessee, that the information on which his impeachment was grounded came from the Executive. But suppose that information had not been communicated by the Executive? Would that have precluded all inquiry? Suppose too, in the case of Mr. Pickering, that no information had been received from the Executive, and that a gentleman from New Hampshire had risen and said "However painful the task, I deem it my duty to state that the conduct of the judge of the district in which I reside, has been such as renders him unfit for the important station which he holds, and I therefore move for an inquiry into his conduct." Would the House have denied the inquiry? Will they rely altogether on the attorney of the district, whose interest it is to be well with the judge, and whose patience must be worn out with his misconduct before he will undertake to call the attention of Government to it? Are gentlemen aware of the delicate situation in which those officers are placed? Suppose information had been given to a member of the malfeasance of a judge by a person who should say: "It is not pleasant to originate accusations; those who come forward in these cases undertake an invidious task; while therefore I wish my name not to be mentioned, I shall be ready when called upon, by proper authority, to give my testimony." This is a hypothetical case, but one by no means improbable. Would it not be a point of honor not to expose the name of the informant?

But say gentlemen, the charge is of a general nature. While I do not admit the force of this remark, supposing it to be correct, I deny that it is a general charge. The inquiry is general, but it is founded on a statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I made no other statement. I have said that I believed there existed grounds of impeachment. What they are I shall not state here. They may be those exhibited by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or they may be others. Will gentlemen assert that the statement of facts made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not, if true, warrant an impeachment? What does it amount to? A person under a criminal prosecution, having a Constitutional right to the aid of counsel in his defence, has, by the arbitrary and vexatious conduct of the court, been denied this right. Such is the nature of the charge. Has it come to this, that an unrighteous judge may condemn whom he pleases to an ignominious death, without a hearing, in the teeth of the Constitution and laws, and that such proceedings should find advocates here? Shall we be told that judges have certain rights, and whatever the Constitution or laws may declare to the contrary we must continue to travel in the go-cart of precedent, and the injured remain unredressed? No, sir, let us throw aside these leading-strings and crutches of precedent, and march with a firm step to the object before us.

As to the motion of postponement, Mr. R. said it was of little consequence to him whether it prevailed or not. On a charge of specific malfeasance, he thought it impossible to refuse an inquiry. Whatever should be the result he should rest satisfied with having discharged his duty to the House and to the nation. Believing the circumstances to demand inquiry, he had made it. Without circulating whispers of reproach, he had given the person implicated that opportunity of vindicating his character which he himself should require if he stood in the same unfortunate situation.

The Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 6.

A memorial of the officers of the militia of the District of Columbia was presented to the House and read, praying a revision and amendment of an act of Congress, passed at the last session, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia," for the reasons therein specified.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. VARNUM, Mr. JOHN SMITH of Virginia, Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL, Mr. STEPHENSON, and Mr. NICHOLAS R. MOORE; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Ordered, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, on the eighteenth of October last, so much of the Message from the President of the United States, of the seventeenth of the same month, as relates "to the adopting of measures for preventing the flag of the United States from being used by vessels not really American," have leave to report thereon by bill or bills, or otherwise.

Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHILL, from the committee last mentioned, presented a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

A petition of sundry aliens, resident in the city of Baltimore, was presented to the House and read, praying that the act of Congress, entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject," passed the fourteenth of April, one thousand eight hundred and two, may be so amended, that the petitioners and others, who resided in the United States previous to the passing of the said act, may be admitted to the rights of citizens after five years' residence.—Referred to Mr. MCCREERY, Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, and Mr. JOSEPH CLAY; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

Mr. BARD.—For many reasons this House must have been justly surprised by a recent measure of one of the Southern States. The impressions, however, which that measure gave my mind, were deep and painful. Had I been informed that some formidable foreign Power had invaded our country, I would not, I ought not, be more alarmed than on hearing that South Carolina had repealed her law prohibiting the importation of slaves.

In the one case we would know what to do. The emergency itself would inspire exertion, and suggest suitable means of repelling the attack. But here we are nonplussed, and find ourselves without resource. Our hands are tied and we are obliged to stand confounded, while we see the flood-gate opened, and pouring incalculable miseries into our country. By the repeal of that law, fresh activity is given to the horrid traffic, which has been long since seriously regretted by the wise and humane, but none have been able to devise an adequate remedy to its dreadful consequences.

Congress has but little power, or rather they have no power to prevent the growth of the evil. To impose a tax on imported slaves is the extent of their power; but every one must see that it is infinitely disproportionate to what the morality, the interest, the peace, and safety, of individuals, and of the public, at this moment, demand. And though in regard to their present case the power of the General Government may be insufficient to check the mischief, yet I hope they are disposed to discourage it, as far as they are authorized by the Constitution. Therefore I beg leave to offer the House the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a tax of ten dollars be imposed upon every slave imported into the United States."

Ordered to lie on the table.

OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF JUDGE CHASE.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion of the fifteenth instant, "for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States," and the said motion, as originally proposed, being again read, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to report their opinion whether the said Samuel Chase hath so acted in his judicial capacity, as to require the interposition of the Constitutional power of this House:"

A motion was made and seconded to amend the same, by inserting, after the words "one of the Associate Justices of the United States," the following words, "and of Richard Peters, District Judge of the district of Pennsylvania."

MR. SMILIE.—When the motion now under consideration was made yesterday, I should have felt surprised at the course which the debate took had I not often witnessed such things in former times. It seems to be considered as improper that a gentleman should bring forward a motion for an inquiry into the official conduct of a public officer, and expect the House to comply with his request, unless he should at the same time produce such evidence as shall prove the facts charged. If this course of proceeding be correct, I have ever been in error. What does the gentleman from Virginia ask? Suppose he has taken exception to the conduct of the judge from some facts which have come to his own knowledge. Under such circumstances it will be allowed that it is the duty of the House to make the inquiry. When the question shall be whether an impeachment shall be preferred, it will be proper that evidence should be produced. But now only a committee is asked to receive evidence, and to determine whether it be such as in their opinion will afford grounds for an impeachment. It is impossible for me to conceive any way that can be pursued which will be more favorable to the person whose character is implicated than that which is proposed. It is merely to inquire whether such facts can be sustained as will afford grounds for an impeachment. Certainly in this stage of the business it is not necessary to produce evidence to the House, as the House are not competent to receive testimony, which a committee is. It is a rule of this House that so much respect is due to a member, that if he states that he possesses information proper to be communicated to the House, but which in his opinion ought not to be done but with closed doors; that, in such case, the doors shall be shut without any vote of the House.

Surely, then, on the request of a member for a committee of inquiry, that measure ought to be adopted. This, in my opinion, is the best course that can be pursued for the person implicated. There is, it is true, thereby expressed an opinion of some one member that this judge has done wrong. So far his character is implicated; this is the only possible way in which it is implicated. The committee are to inquire whether there are grounds for an impeachment or not. If they report that there are not grounds, the accusation will be dismissed; and if the report is that there are grounds, the House will at once perceive the necessity of taking this step to ascertain their existence.

Another ground of resistance is taken. It is said there are precedents for this proceeding. I believe that all precedents must have an origin; and that one person has as good a right to establish them as another. Our Government is young, and only two cases of impeachment have occurred under it. Most of our precedents respecting Parliamentary proceedings are borrowed from England, and, if precedents are necessary in this affair, we must resort to that country for them. My opinion is that they are not necessary, and that common sense and the reason of the thing are all that are necessary to guide our decision in this case. There is, however, in the British annals, no deficiency of precedents. The first I shall mention is to be found in the case of the Earl of Strafford. I may be told that this precedent was established in turbulent times: I may also be told of the improper mode of proceeding. I do not pretend to vindicate the whole course of procedure. I think it was wrong. But with regard to the first stages of the business, I believe them to have been correct. It will be seen that, in that instance, a more direct mode was pursued than is proposed in the present case.

The precedent I allude to will be found in Hume's History, vol. 2, page 249. That historian says,—"A concerted attack was made upon the Earl of Strafford in the House of Commons. It was led by Pym, who, after expatiating on a long list of popular grievances, added, 'we must inquire from what fountain these waters of bitterness flow; and though, doubtless, many evil councillors will be found to have contributed their endeavors, yet is there one who challenges the infamous pre-eminence, and who, by his courage, enterprise, and capacity, is entitled to the first place among these betrayers of their country. He is the Earl of Strafford, the Lieutenant of Ireland, and President of the Council of York, who, in both places, and in all other provinces where he has been entrusted with authority, has raised ample monuments of tyranny, and will appear, from a survey of his actions, to be the chief promoter of every arbitrary council.' Many others entered into the same topics, and it was moved that Strafford should be impeached. Lord Falkland alone, though the known enemy of Strafford, entreated the House not to act with precipitation. But Pym replied that delay would blast all their hopes; without further debate the impeachment was voted, and Pym was chosen to carry it up to the Lords."

In this case it does not appear that any evidence was called for; a member of the House of Commons got up and declared his opinion of that officer, and the same session an impeachment was voted. This course of proceeding is very different from that now proposed. I will now refer to a more modern precedent which at the time does not appear to have been objected to. It occurred in the reign of George I, and will be found stated in Russell's "Modern Europe," vol. 4, page 398.

Official Conduct of Judge Chase.

JANUARY, 1804.

"A new Parliament was called in which the interest of the Whigs predominated, and a secret committee, chosen by ballot, was appointed to examine all the papers, and inquire into all the negotiations relative to the late peace, as well as the cessation of arms by which it was preceded. The Committee of Secrecy prosecuted their inquiry with the greatest eagerness, and, in consequence of their report, the Commons resolved to impeach Lord Bolingbroke, the Earl of Oxford, and the Duke of Ormond, of high treason."

One circumstance is worthy of attention. A cause of dissatisfaction at the conduct of the judge has undoubtedly prevailed. Whether he is wrongfully accused I will not say; but the dissatisfaction is manifest; for the Representatives of two respectable States lately came forward and opposed his being assigned to circuits which embraced their States. This single fact ought to make an impression on the House.

It is alleged that there is no proof before the House; but one thing is notorious—is universally known. It is this, that this man (Fries) was tried before that judge for his life, and was tried without being heard. This fact cannot be disputed. When we consider the importance of the life of a citizen, and know that such an event has taken place, is it not the duty of the only body competent to inquire into the fact? With other gentlemen, I believe that the fountains of justice ought to be kept pure; I believe also that the judges are like other men, and that like them they are subject to the common frailties of human nature; and I do believe that when the frailties of human nature produce such effects, the House cannot be justified to themselves or their country without making an inquiry. Our duty to our country calls for it; our duty to the man who is implicated also calls for it. If innocent, a proper regard to his character claims it; and his friend from Maryland informs us that he will rejoice at this opportunity of coming forward and vindicating himself. If, then, the inquiry be equally necessary for placing the character of the man upon its proper footing, and for preserving the purity of justice, how can the House resist it?

Mr. DENNIS said he had only expressed an opinion that such an investigation would be rather solicited than avoided by Judge Chase.

Mr. LEIB.—I am by no means an enemy to inquiry, but I am not a friend to the partiality of this resolution. We are told that it is grounded on the misconduct of the Circuit Court in Philadelphia on the trial of Fries. If one judge of that court was guilty of misconduct, the other attending judge must have been equally guilty. The conduct complained of was the act of the court, and not of an individual judge. This resolution ought therefore to embrace both the attending judges. My opinion is that both are criminal, and ought to be brought to the bar of justice. I therefore move an amendment of the resolution by introducing the name of Richard Peters, so as to embrace an inquiry into the conduct of both judges, and call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—I wish to state for the information of those gentlemen who were not in the last Congress, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, whose statement, thus made, is the groundwork of the present inquiry, did not offer any matter which tended to impeach the conduct of Mr. Peters, while there was a specific charge of misconduct brought against the other judge. In consequence of this charge I conceived it my duty to make an inquiry into the official conduct of Judge Chase. I mention this circumstance to show that however the charge of partiality may apply to the resolution, it cannot apply to the mover.

Mr. LEIB.—I do not charge the mover with partiality, but the resolution, with embracing one judge instead of two. Judge Peters was on the bench at the time. This outrage upon justice was the act of the court. How the conduct, therefore, of one judge shall claim investigation, while that of the other is passed over in silence, to me is mysterious. I think impartial justice calls for an investigation into the conduct of both.

Mr. SMILIE said there could be no doubt that if the court were agreed, Judge Peters had been equally guilty of misconduct. On the trial of Fries, Mr. Chase presided, and Mr. Peters attended. If Judge Peters concurred in the decision, he was equally culpable.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—This resolution is grounded upon a statement made during the last session, by a member from Pennsylvania implicating the character of one of the justices of the Supreme Court. Upon information thus given, my friend from Virginia has thought himself bound to bring the business before the House, that an inquiry may be made into his conduct. For myself I will never hesitate, I care not who the person implicated may be, and however exalted his station, to give my vote for inquiring into his official conduct, when a member of this House rises in his place, and states that, in his opinion, he has been guilty of misconduct. For this reason I shall vote for the amendment; it having been stated by a member that Judge Peters was on the bench and did concur with Judge Chase.

And on the question that the House do agree to the said amendment, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 37, as follows:

MR. LOWNDES.—Were I to be governed by considerations other than those resulting from a sense of duty I should vote for this resolution, as I believe it would afford the character implicated the readiest mode of vindication. But I do not feel so high a respect for the opinion of any one member as to give up my opinion to his, as to the course most proper to be pursued on this occasion. The gentleman who has offered this resolution says, that the facts on which it is founded are within his own knowledge. Let the gentleman then lay them before the House. Otherwise we shall legislate not on the facts before us, but merely on the opinion of a single member on facts only known to himself. We are told that this motion is founded on the statement of an honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania. What is that statement? That one of the counsel in the trial of Fries informed him that the judge declared the counsel had no right to argue a point of law after the mind of the court was made up. I ask if any gentleman is prepared to say that the judge was wrong? I am not prepared to say so. While, too, I am unwilling to detract from the respect due to the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I am equally unwilling to subscribe to his opinions. He may have misconceived the information communicated to him. It is said that it is necessary to preserve pure the streams of justice. I agree in this remark, and I say that the resolution on the table goes to destroy the independence of the judges, and of consequence to pollute the streams of justice; to make the judges the flexible tools of this House. It is impossible that under such circumstances men of talents and integrity will take seats on the bench, when their character shall be liable to be scrutinized without any facts being previously adduced.

I think it absolutely necessary that this resolution should not pass. For if it passes, it will establish a precedent that any member may procure an investigating committee to inquire into the conduct of any executive or judicial officer merely upon his opinion, unsupported by facts that such an inquiry is necessary. Suppose parties to be nearly equally divided; a member has only to propose an inquiry into the conduct of any officer to whom he may feel inimical, and thereby throw a cloud upon his character, and render him the object of suspicion. Thus do I fear that this precedent will furnish the instrument of vengeance of one party against another. The price we pay for our liberties is the existence of parties among us; but it becomes us rather to restrain than to invigorate their passions. If we establish this precedent we shall render impeachments so easy, as greatly to facilitate the means of oppression.

MR. LOWNDES concluded by saying that in this affair he threw party considerations entirely out of view. He was personally unacquainted with Judge Chase, and if there was a single affidavit of his misconduct, the appointment of the committee of inquiry should have his vote; but that under the circumstances attending it, he considered the measure improper in every point of view in which he could consider it.

MR. FINDLEY observed, that though the abstract right of the members to move for an inquiry into the conduct of public officers, in order to find whether presumptions against their character afforded ground for impeachment, was not expressly denied, yet the manner in which the opposition to the present resolution was conducted was equal to denying the right. He trusted, however, that the House would support this right, as it was one of the most important of any with which they were vested. It grew out of the power of impeachment, and it was necessary for the exercise of that power, and was justified by precedents. By the rules of the House any member has a right to have the doors shut in order to move such a resolution as he thinks proper. This has been usual in cases of impeachment in Britain, from which we derive the forms of impeachment. There it has been common to shut the doors and for a member to move for an impeachment of a public officer, and to procure the officer impeached to be taken into custody before there was time or opportunity to take any other testimony than the information stated by the member who moved the resolution, probably supported by public fame. Taking the party into custody was necessary to the circumstances of that country and the extent of punishment, which might not only affect the liberty and property, but even the life of the party found guilty. It was necessary because of the influence of the powerful nobility, who might have it in their power to stand in their defence; but, as all the penalties in the power of this Government to inflict by impeachment only affect the official trust and character, taking into custody is unnecessary.

He observed, that the arguments in opposition to the resolution turned chiefly on the ground of expediency and of precedent.

In his opinion it appeared not only expedient but necessary, from the notoriety of facts on which the resolution was founded; that they were publicly known and had impaired confidence in these judges, could not be denied. That it was known to Congress during the last session was acknowledged. It was not only known, but Congress acted on it. A bill was in progress before this House appointing the attendance of judges to particular districts—the members of two respectable States in which, by the bill, Judge Chase was appointed to attend, objected unanimously to that appointment, because they had not confidence in him; and the facts on which the resolution is founded were stated on the floor, upon which the House altered the bill and appointed another judge to that district. This was a strong testimony that Congress believed that this open expression of want of confidence in that gentleman was justified by the facts that had been stated. He said, that though he had not at that time a seat in the House, he had expected an inquiry to be made into the causes of this want of confidence at that time. Perhaps it was prevented by the shortness of the session.

It is expedient for the character of the gentlemen and for the public good; for the gentlemen themselves, if they are innocent or have acted on justifiable ground; it is necessary that their characters may be vindicated, and confidence in their public conduct restored. It is expedient for the public good, because if the judges are guilty in the manner stated—if they have justly lost the confidence of the people and of Congress, as it appears by the transaction of last session, one of them has done, the case ought to be examined and the citizens protected; for if he was unfit to preside on the bench for one district, he is unfit to preside in another. It is expedient, in order to secure the confidence of the citizens in the Government itself.

But precedents are called for by the gentlemen opposed to the resolution, and several of them contend that such special facts should be stated as would be unexceptionable ground of impeachment, before the inquiry is gone into. A gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. ELLIOT,) who argued yesterday in favor of postponement for further information on the subject, in the same argument said that he never would agree to the appointment of a committee of inquiry, until the charges were first stated and proved to his satisfaction. Mr. F. said he was astonished at this inconsistency. If the facts were first stated and established, appointing a committee of inquiry would be an absurdity. What would they inquire after but what they already knew? That gentleman and others, in order to defeat the resolution, gave the object of it an odious designation: they called it an inquisition and spoke of it in such terms as if it was the well known Spanish law of that name. The character of that court was too well known to the members of this House to require definition; it was sufficient to say that in it witnesses were examined without the knowledge of the party accused; that it compelled the accused to give testimony against themselves, and had authority to pass sentence of the most dreadful kind, without appeal. The gentlemen knew that no such thing was intended by the resolution. The character of the judges had been impeached in public opinion, by numerous citizens of all descriptions. Congress on that account gave a decisive testimony of want of confidence in one of them. The object of the resolution was to inquire whether there was a real foundation for this want of confidence and ill fame. If Congress did not make inquiry in such cases, who was to do it? It did not by the Constitution belong to any other authority; every other method of proceeding would be as ingeniously objected to as the one proposed, by those who wished to prevent further proceedings in the case; denying the means of bringing forward impeachment, had the same effect as if the power of impeachment was renounced.

The power of this House has been asserted to be similar to that of a grand jury; this seems to be conceded on both sides, but though it bears a resemblance, it was not strictly so—it was more extensive. Grand juries were authorized to present such indictments or such complaint or information as were submitted to them by the Attorney General, or which they knew of their own knowledge. The attorney also inquires if there is probable ground for the complaint, and brings the witnesses before the jury, who examine them to establish the facts alleged; but this House has no officers authorized to make inquiry and bring forward the business in due form; therefore the House possess both the power of the Attorney General and the grand jury, with relation to impeachment; for where a power of decision is given, all the powers necessary to carry that decision into effect are implied. The making inquiry, procuring witnesses, or other testimony, and preparing the case in due form, is the object of the resolution; and if the House does not do it in this or some other such method, there is no other agent authorized to do it.

With respect to precedent and Parliamentary usage, Mr. F. said he had formerly examined many, but was not prepared to state them at this time, and did not think them necessary on this occasion. In all the examples of impeachment by the British Parliament, from the reign of Henry VIII, when Parliamentary power was reduced to a mere shadow, till the present time, when the Parliamentary power has been amply enlarged and established, and their proceedings become more uniform, there will be shades of difference found in all of them, arising from various circumstances; we have few precedents of our own, and of these few none of them apply to the present case. It is the Constitutional duty of this House to impeach, when impeachment is necessary, and of the Senate to decide on impeachments; but with respect to the manner in which each House should proceed, they are not trammelled by forms nor entangled in precedents.

There are, however, examples of proceedings both with the British Parliament and with us, as similar to the method now proposed as the various cases would admit. With ourselves, the case of the unfortunate Western expedition mentioned by my colleague (Mr. GREGG) yesterday, was much more to the purpose than the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD) was willing to admit. Mr. F. said he had the honor to be one of the committee of inquiry which sat on that subject a great proportion of two sessions. The expedition was too late in setting out to the Indian country; they were said to have been illy provided with necessaries, and long detained for want of them; a large proportion of the army were killed or taken by the savages, and all the stores with the army left. The citizens were discontented, and numerous complaints were heard, but none knew with certainty whom to blame; a committee was appointed to examine witnesses and report the testimony to the House, in order to discover the party who had been to blame. Some had charged it on the commanding General, others on the Secretary of War, and others on the Commissary of Military Stores, and these last endeavored to wrest the blame from themselves and fix it on the General. It was certain that a great misfortune had happened, but it was not certain that any officer was to blame; no charge had been made to Congress against any officer, yet Congress thought proper to make an inquiry, and it was not opposed on account of want of form, or want of precedents, by any of the friends of the parties. Towards the close of the first session, the committee made a concise report, referring to a great amount of testimonies. Some of the parties implicated by the report thought themselves injured by it, and it was alleged that other witnesses ought to be examined. Consequently, at the next session, the business was recommitted to the same committee, and as it was near the close of the last session of that Congress, before all the witnesses were procured and examined, and the parties heard by the committee, each of the parties wrote and delivered to the committee a large book of explanations and defence. The committee reported a large wooden box full of testimony, of original letters and instructions, and the three books of explanations and defence accompanied with some observations. It was not possible for that Congress to enter on the business, and the cause being of a transient nature, and the parties who applied for the second inquiry not wishing a disclosure of the testimony, the business was not afterwards entered on; but the mass of testimony, &c., is yet in possession of Congress. This, it is presumed, applies well in favor of the present resolution.

Gentlemen object to the resolution because of the indelicacy of implicating the character of a judge. They seem to believe the character of a judge to be sacred and immaculate. But are not judges men? Are they not men subject to like passions and like feelings as other men? Judges and other official characters voluntarily surrender a part of the rights they enjoyed in common with other citizens, in return for the honors and emoluments of office; others have a right to the privilege of trial by jury, in the decision of all charges against them; but public officers, by accepting of office, subject themselves, under this Government, to trial by impeachment. Subjecting judges to impeachment, indicates, unequivocally, a Constitutional opinion that judges would be even more liable to transgress than other citizens, and might transgress in a more aggravated manner than mere citizens. This mode of trial, however, in this country, is become almost a harmless thing; it is deprived of more than half its terrors. It does not reach life or property, but only the official character.

Mr. F. said he was a friend to the independence of judges, but that all independence in all Governments had its limits and restraints. It was not provided for the aggrandizement of the judges, but for the protection of the citizens. So far as it is applicable to this purpose, it is necessary, but any further, it is injurious and subjected to restraint. Under no Government with which we are acquainted are the judges rendered so independent as that of the United States. In Britain, from which we have derived the mode of our judiciary, the judges were appointed during pleasure; till little more than a century ago, they were rendered independent by the Revolution Parliament for the security of the people against the encroachments of the Monarch, and the overbearing influence of a very powerful nobility, and for this purpose it was not only salutary, but absolutely necessary. But even with that boasted independence, that Judiciary is subjected to restraints and modes of correction not provided in the Federal Constitution. The judges are liable to be removed from office by the vote of both Houses of Parliament, without trial. They are liable to be removed, or their standing changed by act of Parliament. That Parliament, on whose act their independence depends, can repeal the act; the two Houses of Parliament can make and unmake their Kings. They are also liable, by an act of attainder, not only to lose their office, but their estate, the honor of their families, and even their lives.

The Judiciaries in all the States of the Union are rendered less or more independent, some are appointed for shorter and some for longer periods. In New Jersey, they are appointed for seven years; they were so in Pennsylvania formerly; since the revision of the Constitution they are appointed during good behaviour; they are, however, subjected not only to removal by impeachment, but also by the vote of two-thirds of each House, for any cause which the House do not think a sufficient cause of impeachment; but in the Federal Government there is no method provided for removing them for the most scandalous indiscretions or incapacity, as even when they may unfortunately be under mental derangement, except by impeachment, which is inapplicable to official crimes, and conducted with tedious forms. The power of impeaching being the only shield provided by the Government for the protection of the citizens from judicial oppression, and this House being the only Constitutional organ for obtaining information of official excesses, and bringing forward articles of impeachment, ought not to bind up their own hands from doing their duty, and this they will do if they reject the resolution now on the table.

But while the gentlemen consider the character of these judges so sacred that their conduct cannot be inquired into, notwithstanding such proofs of want of confidence in them, and that as a gentleman near me from South Carolina (Mr. Lowndes) has said that he is afraid of impeachment, and grounds his fears on the incapacity or the unfitness of the members of this House, or because the members of this House may abuse the power; Mr. F. asked, were not the members of this House selected and qualified for the discharge of this necessary duty? Were they not appointed by as respectable authority as the judges? Were they not under a solemn oath of office for the faithful discharge of this as well as every part of their high trust? And were they not protected by special privileges and protection during the discharge of their trust equally with the judges, and their stations as respectable as the judges? They are not only protected from civil actions, but are not subjected to impeachment for misbehaviour in office as the judges are. They are, in their official capacity, subjected only to the censure of public opinion. If this is true, it is improper, it is impolitic, for the members of this House to degrade their own character: it amounts to saying, they are not capable of discharging the trust they are solemnly bound to discharge, and ought not to have been invested with. He knew, however, that this was only introduced as an excuse for unwillingness. But the same gentleman adds, as a reason for opposing the resolution, that he is not acquainted with the history of the business. That is probably the case with him and others, especially such as had not a seat in the last session of Congress, or who resided at a great distance from the scene alluded to in the resolution. Admitting this to be true, the best and the only regular way to become acquainted with the history of the case, is to carry the resolution into effect—to have a committee appointed with such power as would enable them to procure such information as that gentleman and every other member could depend on. The gentleman's objection, in fact, is one of the strongest arguments in favor of the resolution. The gentleman from South Carolina has, however, offered one other objection to the resolution, which merits some notice. He has said that if a committee is appointed for the object proposed by the resolution, men of character and talents will not accept of appointments in the Judiciary. The solidity of this objection will be best examined by the test of observation and experience. It has been already mentioned that several States have appointed their supreme judges for short periods, and that others have vested the Legislature with the power of removing judges from office without impeachment, merely on their own opinion. Can the gentleman from South Carolina say—can any member on this floor, where all the States are represented, say—that these States are deficient in judges of respectability and talents? They cannot say so—there is no such complaint. The Judiciary of New Jersey, where the judges are chosen but for seven years, is as respectable, and the application of her laws as well brought home to the security and happiness of her citizens as they are in the States where judges are appointed for life. The same may be asserted with confidence of the State of Pennsylvania, before the revision of her constitution as they are since. There is this difference, however: where they have been appointed for limited periods there has been no impeachments or removals, and generally, if not always, the judges were reappointed, and justice was well administered; but since they have been appointed for good behaviour, there has, at least in Pennsylvania, been both, and more complaints of inattention, expense, and delays, in the administration of justice than had been formerly. Many of the judges, however, are very respectable, and enjoy a high degree of confidence, but not more confidence than they did before the change of the constitution. There has been no attempt to remove or impeach the judges of the supreme court of that State.

To inquire into the conduct of the judges when confidence in them is evidently wanting, is the only true way to secure the respectability of the Judiciary. If that necessary confidence is withdrawn without cause, an official inquiry will restore confidence and the usefulness of the judges. This observation is supported by precedent and parliamentary usage. In that country from which precedents are so frequently sought, one precedent offers itself to recollection. In the year 1730 a committee of the British House of Commons was appointed to examine the jails. In the course of examination, the committee discovered that Sir Robert Eyres, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, a judge of very respectable character, was suspected, not of tyranny on the bench, or of putting any man's life in jeopardy, but of having held an improper correspondence with a person confined for crime or misdemeanor, and this suspicion chiefly supported by anonymous letters. A committee of the House of Commons were appointed to make inquiry, and it was found, to the satisfaction of the committee and of the people, that the allegations on which the suspicion was founded were false, and the judge's character was vindicated and restored.

Mr. F. said this precedent applied well to the present case. If the judges mentioned in the resolution had done their duty, their characters would be vindicated by the inquiry, and the public confidence in their integrity restored; if they were guilty, and not entitled to confidence, they ought to be removed from office, and neither the one nor the other could be done unless the inquiry proposed was authorized.

He said that the inquiry was necessary to secure the purity, honor, and usefulness of the Judiciary department. If that House refused or neglected to exert the powers vested therein for securing public confidence in the Judiciary, unprincipled men would find means of recommending themselves to appointments, and would vitiate the streams where justice is expected to flow, and the citizens would be oppressed without the means or hopes of redress, and would feel the effects of tyrannical power in the administration of a Government which, in its other departments, was the greatest and best of any in the world. Let proper inquiries be made where they are necessary; let the character of judges unjustly charged be vindicated, and the vicious and unworthy be removed, and improper characters will cease to intrude themselves; their friends will not dare to recommend, and Congress will have confidence that the laws which they pass will be applied, agreeably to their genuine principles, to the protection and ease of the citizens; if we do not provide for this, we had better cease to make laws.

If virtuous men are appointed and the vicious discouraged, Congress may, from particular circumstances, be called on to make inquiries, but very rarely indeed to be employed in impeachments, (no men of real virtue and talents would refuse a seat on the bench for fear of inquiry or impeachment.) He said that the judges of the supreme court in the State he had the honor of representing, though they differed in political opinions, administered justice with such purity and diligence, that though some of them had been long in office, they enjoyed the confidence of the citizens, were in no danger of impeachment or removal by vote, and he believed would not shrink from inquiry if necessary. The more extensive the confidence of the citizens that was reposed in the Judiciary, the easier it would be to supply vacancies with men of character and talents. He said that among several other observations which occurred to his mind, with offering which he would not now detain the House, he had once thought of stating other charges against the official conduct of these judges, of which he had been well informed, but on due reflection he declined mentioning them, and thought it most for the public good to insist on the appointment demanded by a member on the responsibility of his own official character, and as a matter of right, and would do nothing that would impair the weight of the precedent that he hoped would be set by agreeing to the resolution as it stood.

Mr. F. said that having so long engaged the attention of the House he would conclude by observing, that as the case now stood it is proper for all the members to vote for the resolution; those that believed as he did, that there was a want of necessary confidence in those judges, and that this want of confidence was occasioned by their unauthorized and oppressive conduct, were obliged in conscience to vote for the inquiry; and every member who believed the judges to have done their duty, and that the public confidence is withdrawn from them without cause, are bound in duty to vote for the resolution, in order that the judges may have an opportunity to vindicate their character, that confidence in them being restored they may become useful to the public; therefore, in every light he could view it, he was convinced it was his duty to vote for the resolution, and would act accordingly.

Mr. JACKSON.—As, Mr. Speaker, this subject is novel in its nature, and may be important in its consequences, I presume there exists a disposition to hear the reasoning which any gentleman may be disposed to offer upon it. It is with this view that I rise to express my opinion in favor of creating a committee of inquiry. I consider this House as the grand inquest of the nation, whose duty it is to inquire, on a proper representation, into the conduct of every official character under the Government. Like a grand jury, we ought, in my opinion, at the instance of any member, to send for all persons possessed of information calculated to throw light upon the conduct of any individual inculpated. A contrary doctrine would lead to the most unfortunate consequences. It would lead to this, that a minority would never be able to inquire into the conduct of a State offender, unless such inquiry were favored by the majority. As it is now contended that the inquiry is not a matter of right which any member may demand, but a matter of favor, to be granted according to the pleasure of the majority, it may be said that, if a majority favor an individual, he will always escape without an impeachment. But I believe otherwise; and that the Senate, like a virtuous judge, will not suffer an atom of prejudice or partiality to fall into the scales of justice.

But, say gentlemen, though it may be the duty of the House to impeach an officer, it is necessary that facts, warranting such an impeachment, should be first presented. This is not the course pursued in cases where a grand jury is called upon to act. If a murder is committed it is their duty to inquire, and diligently inquire, who is guilty of the act, and to send for all persons capable of giving information respecting it. Such is the practice. If it shall be required to furnish facts, as is urged by gentlemen, the consequence will be that offences of the highest nature will be committed with impunity. It has been observed that it is odious to undertake the task of a public informer. But what the Constitution and laws make our duty, so far from being odious, is honorable; because we thereby discharge a duty imposed upon us by our oaths, and because we show ourselves unawed by the vicious conduct of bad men. If the character of a public informer be odious, are we to expect that private individuals will come forward with affidavits? In such a case, to say the least of it, the duty would be of an unpleasant nature.

We have, in the course of this debate, been frequently called upon for precedents, and been told that, when found, they ought to be adhered to. In a country from which we are accustomed to draw precedents—England—common report has been considered as a sufficient authority for similar inquiries. We do not, however, ask for an inquiry in this case on common report, but on the declaration of a member of this House, made in his place. Suppose there was no such declaration, has not a common report, from Maine to Georgia, condemned the conduct of the judge in the case of Fries, and others, at Philadelphia, in the case of a grand jury in Delaware, whom he directed to inquire for seditious practices, and in the case of Callender, in Virginia? Has not the general sentiment of the country charged him with having, in these cases, abused his powers as a judge by tyrannizing over those who were brought before him? If we possess the right to inquire, on common report, surely we ought to institute this inquiry on the prevalence of so general a sentiment. To such an inquiry I would unhesitatingly agree, if the character of the President were implicated, the opinion of the gentleman from Vermont to the contrary notwithstanding. I would likewise agree to make the same inquiry in any other case; because the inquiry would redound to the honor of the individual implicated, if innocent; and because, if guilty, he ought to be punished.

I am sorry my friend from Pennsylvania stated any facts, as I do not consider it necessary that the House should be acquainted with any facts to make this inquiry; and because I think the facts, stated as grounds of impeachment, are not such as will warrant an impeachment. I have always understood that it was the right of a judge to expound the law, and I have known frequent instances where the court have refused the counsel the liberty of discussing the law on points on which they have made up their minds. While I am free to declare that the conduct of the court in the trial of Fries is not, in my opinion, such as to require an impeachment, yet I am in favor of instituting the inquiry. But, say gentlemen, by the passage of this resolution, we shall censure the judge. I believe not. If I believed so, I would first require testimony; for I hold it a good principle, that no man ought to be condemned until he has been heard. In my opinion, this resolution will have no such tendency; as, if the judge has not been guilty of misconduct, the inquiry will redound to his honor, and as it is the duty of a virtuous man to demand an inquiry whenever charged with an offence.

Gentlemen, in opposition to this measure, say they wish to guard against suspicion. But suspicion has long since gone forth; has been heard and re-echoed from every part of the Union; and the only way of defeating it, if ill-founded, is to institute an inquiry, and if the character of the judge be innocent, to pronounce it so. I am surprised to find gentlemen, who profess a friendship for the character of one of the persons implicated, opposed to this inquiry, when they believe him innocent. I should suppose it their peculiar duty to call for the inquiry, that the accused might have an opportunity of proving to the world that his character has been assailed without cause.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD.—After what has passed on this floor, there can be no doubt that the gentlemen whose characters are implicated by this resolution will ardently desire an investigation of their conduct; and if, on this floor, we were merely to consult our own wishes, we should unanimously agree on an investigation. But this is not our duty; our duty is to take on this, as well as on all other occasions, a correct course; to take those steps only which are warranted. It is because I doubt, after considerable deliberation, whether this course is warranted, that I am opposed to it. What, I ask, is the nature of the resolution on the table? It contains no charges against the judges implicated; it only proposes to raise a committee to inquire whether their official conduct has been such as to justify the interposition of the Constitutional power of this House. If a committee of inquiry is raised, what will be their powers? One thing will certainly follow. They will be clothed with a power to send for persons, and probably for papers. Is it consistent with principle to appoint a committee, which, from its nature, must be secret, with power to ransack the country in the first instance for accusations against the judges, and then for proofs to support them? Is this correct? Are gentlemen prepared to say so? to seek for accusations, and then for proofs to support those accusations, against high officers of the Government? For one, I believe that this course is not correct. I believe it to be dangerous. I agree with the gentleman from Vermont, that it operates in the nature of an inquisition. A committee will be raised to act in secret, first to find an accusation, and next to prove it. If there is now any accusation against the judges, let it be made; let it be made on this floor; and, as the gentleman from New Jersey has observed, let us ascertain, if true, whether it will be a sufficient ground for an impeachment. This will be a correct course, and it will be the only safe course. If, on the contrary, we proceed in the manner proposed, it will be attended with this consequence: at the commencement of every session we shall raise a secret committee, to compose an inquisition, to ascertain whether there are not charges against some public officer, and to search for proofs to justify them. Is the Government of this country founded on this principle? I know that this secret course of procedure is practised by the Spanish Government, and by some others, but I never thought that it would be the practice of this Government. When a charge is made against a public officer, it ought to be boldly made. It ought to be made here, and should be committed to writing. Instead of this being done, there is no charge made. The resolution contains none. It is merely calculated to raise a secret committee. Why? Because the gentleman from Virginia is of opinion that it is proper. Is his opinion, or the opinion of any other gentleman, to govern this House? Are we brought to this? I trust this is not the case. I trust that gentlemen will think it necessary not only to consider his opinion, but to form their own. What can gentlemen say, if they agree to this resolution? That they voted to investigate the conduct of two judges. Why? Because the gentleman from Virginia says it is necessary to investigate. Why investigate? Because the gentleman demands it. This is the language of that gentleman yesterday. Because a gentleman of this House gives his opinion of the course proper to be pursued on this occasion, it does not follow that we are to be governed by it. We may respect it; but we must respect our own opinions still more, if we faithfully discharge our duty. I am sensible that some facts have been mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or rather, that that gentleman has heard a story; but it is mere hearsay.

I ask, also, how this formidable charge has rested to this day? When and where did the transaction, on which it is founded, happen? In Philadelphia, and in the Winter of the year 1800, when Congress were in session within twenty rods of the place where the court was held. The gentleman from Virginia, as well as other members on this floor, were then in the House. The case being, I believe, the only one in which there was a charge of treason, excited, in a considerable degree, the attention of members, many of whom attended the trial. How comes it, then, that this charge was not then made? If it shall be said the House did not interfere at that time because the criminal was lying under sentence of death, it will be recollected that, in 1801, Fries was pardoned. Why was not the inquiry then made? If it shall be said that it would have been imprudent to make it on account of the party then in power, why was it not made in the seventh Congress, when a change of men took place? How can gentlemen reconcile this great delay with the high regard they profess for the purity of the streams of justice, and for justice itself? For such is the respect they entertain for justice, that they have determined to bring to conviction this unjust and criminal judge. Gentlemen ought to account for this culpable neglect. It is impossible that they should have been ignorant of the trial of this man. It was not a sudden or a hidden thing, done in a corner; it was done in public, in the face of the Legislature, and yet it has slept to the present day. Under such circumstances, I submit it to the House, whether much respect ought to be paid to the hearsay of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The very delay, and other circumstances attending this transaction, show that it is not of the serious nature contended. I therefore think that, if properly brought before the House, and suffered to rest upon proof, it would constitute no ground for impeachment.

As to the proposed form of proceeding, if we examine precedents, we shall find that it is not warranted by them. None mentioned compare with the case under consideration. The precedent in the case of Lord Bolingbroke does not compare with that. In that case the House of Commons raised a secret committee to examine the negotiations made for a peace. The committee was not raised to impeach Lord Bolingbroke, but to investigate the negotiations of the Ministry; and on the disclosure of facts, which took place on that occasion, the impeachment was grounded. Such, also, was the case in the instance of the Western expedition. The House appointed a committee vested with general powers to inquire into the causes of its failure, without particular reference to the conduct of any person.

If we turn our attention to British precedents, we shall find that a committee has never failed to investigate the official conduct of any person contemplated to be impeached. In the case of Hastings, Mr. Burke came forward and moved an impeachment directly. In all cases this course has been pursued in the British House of Commons. So far as we have had precedents in this country, a similar course has been pursued. In the instance of Governor Blount, the Executive transmitted documents to this House, which contained, as it was supposed, evidence of his guilt, they were referred to a committee to examine them, and also to determine whether it was proper to print them.

The committee reported that, in their opinion, they contained evidence of his guilt, and he was impeached. In the case of Judge Pickering, the same course has been pursued. The Executive transmitted documents to the House which contained, as it was supposed, proofs of misconduct, and the House proceeded to an impeachment. These precedents confirm the principle of those drawn from the practice of the British House of Commons. What course is now proposed? Without any charge against the judges, without any man saying they are guilty of any misconduct, we are about to appoint a secret committee, to determine whether any charges can be made, and whether any proofs to support them can be found. Although I am willing that the conduct of these gentlemen shall be investigated, for I am sure they must desire it, and although I have no objection to impeach them, if gentlemen wish it, and exhibit proper proofs on which to ground it, yet I cannot consent to pursue a course so improper as that now proposed. For this reason I am against the resolution, not because I am hostile to an investigation, but because I cannot consent to the appointment of a secret committee to search, in the first instance, for an accusation, and to look for proofs to justify it.

Mr. FINDLEY rose to explain. He said it was not the object of the House, in their investigation of the causes of the failure of the Western expedition, to make new arrangements, but to inquire into the conduct of certain officers who had directed it, viz: the Secretary of War, the Commander-in-Chief, and the Commissary.

Mr. NICHOLSON said, he happened not to be in the House yesterday at the moment when the resolution, under consideration, was introduced; and when he entered he found the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. R. GRISWOLD) on the floor, who concluded his remarks by moving a postponement. Mr. N. did not think it then correct to offer remarks upon the main question, but as the resolution itself was now under consideration, and the subject of no common nature, he could not think of passing a silent vote upon it.

When he rose, to-day, for a few moments, on the motion to amend, by inserting the name of Judge Peters, he had then declared, and he now begged leave to repeat it, that whenever any member of the House should rise in his place and state that any officer of the Government had been guilty of official misconduct, he had no hesitation in saying, that he would consent to an inquiry. He cared not how exalted his station, or how far he was raised above the rest of the community; the very circumstance of his superior elevation would prove an additional incitement. Such, he said, was the nature of the Government, and so important the duty, in this respect, devolved upon the House of Representatives, that the conduct of the Chief Magistrate himself, as far as his vote could effect it, should be subjected to an inquiry whenever it was demanded by a member. The greater responsibility, the more easy and more simple should be the means of investigation. Were he, indeed, the friend, personal or political, of the officer charged, and he believed that impeachment would be the result of inquiry, it was possible that his feelings as a man might induce him to forget his duty as a Representative, and urge him to resist the inquiry; but, were he convinced of his innocence, he would do all in his power to promote it, in order that he might stand justified to the nation and to the world.

Upon the present occasion, he begged that he might not be understood to say that the offence with which these judges were charged, was such as would warrant an impeachment. But, while he meant not to commit himself on a question of such high moment, he could not avoid expressing his astonishment that the conduct stated should not only be defended upon the floor of the House, but entirely approved; that gentlemen should venture to declare that the court acted strictly in the line of their duty, in refusing to hear counsel on a point of law which involved the guilt or the innocence of the prisoner. A man was charged with the highest offence against the Government, and, if guilty, was subject to the severest and most ignominious punishment recognised by our laws. High treason was the crime, and death the penalty. The Constitution declared that treason against the United States should consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. The framers of the Constitution intended to be as precise as possible in their definition of treason, they were anxious that no room should be left for doubt afterwards. They had seen to what an infinite variety of objects the crime of treason had been extended in England, and wisely confined it here to the only two offences which could be said to strike at the existence of the Government. The laws of the United States had declared that resistance to the execution of a law should only be considered as sedition, and had provided the punishment of fine and imprisonment. Fries was charged with resisting the execution of a law, and this offence the court determined to be treason, without hearing his counsel, and refused to permit them to address the jury on the subject, although the jury were the judges as well of the law as the fact. A resistance to the execution of a law, they construed to be treason, in the face of the act of Congress, which declared it to be a misdemeanor only, punishable with fine and imprisonment. These constructive treasons, he said, had been reprobated by the wise and good in all ages, and at a very early period in the history of English jurisprudence had received the pointed disapprobation of the Parliament. He adverted to what he called a wise and humane provision in the statute of Edward III., by which the judges were prohibited from declaring anything to be treason not so expressly defined by the letter of the statute. That the court had given such an opinion, was not now, however, the point of charge against them; that they extended the doctrine of treason beyond both the letter and spirit of the Constitution, was not now the foundation of the present motion. The accusation was that, in a case involving the life or death of a freeman, the party was condemned without a hearing; that he was denied the assistance of counsel, which was secured to him by the Constitution of his country; that the right of the jury to decide both the law and the fact was refused; for it amounted to a refusal when the court would not permit the jury to be assisted by the arguments of counsel. He asked if gentlemen would consider it correct in a court, upon an indictment for murder, to prohibit the prisoner's counsel from contending before the jury, that the offence charged amounted to manslaughter only? Surely not. The question, in the case of Fries, was, whether the act of which he had been guilty amounted to treason, or to a misdemeanor? and this the court refused to suffer the jury to have an argument upon. He declared that, in all criminal prosecutions, the jury had a clear, undoubted right to decide, as well the law as the fact; they were not bound by the direction of the court; and that, in capital cases, it was a right which they ought always to exercise. But, in Fries's case, the law was not permitted to be brought into the view of the jury by his counsel; the court denied to the prisoner the assistance of counsel, which was secured to him by the Constitution, and he was condemned to an ignominious death, which he must have suffered but for the subsequent interference of the Executive. Mr. N. said, he had thought proper to make these remarks in answer to those gentlemen who had undertaken to pronounce the conduct of the court to be strictly correct. Although he did not mean to commit himself by declaring that this afforded sufficient ground for impeachment, yet he could not avoid saying, that the refusal to hear counsel in defence of the prisoner, did not meet his approbation.

The gentleman from Connecticut had doubted whether the present proceeding was conformable to principle. He thought that we ought to have the proof before we take any steps to procure it. Mr. N. begged leave to ask how proof was to be procured before inquiry was made? In what manner information was to be obtained before it was sought for? If a member had stated upon oath that a judge had been guilty of improper conduct, which would warrant an impeachment, the motion would not be, in the first instance, to inquire, but to impeach. If information was necessary, how was it to be procured? By sitting here, and writing for depositions to be sent in? Surely not. If a person was in the lobby, acquainted with all the facts, how were they to be communicated to the House? Was he to come to the bar, and offer a voluntary affidavit, or would it be correct to introduce him without any previous proceeding? In that case, would it not be necessary to declare, by a prior resolution, that we would commence an inquiry before testimony could be offered at the bar? If a member should state that a witness was at hand who could prove official misconduct in a judge, the correct course would be to introduce a resolution, declaring that the House would inquire, and it could not be resisted. What, he asked, was the proposed course? Instead of making the inquiry in the House, it was requested that it might be made by a committee. Instead of using our power to bring witnesses before us, it is proposed to authorize a committee to examine them. This would be more convenient and more proper. To bring them before the House would be attended with inconvenience, and unnecessary delay. He could not tell what the mode of proceeding before the House of Representatives would be, but, generally, he believed, it was the practice for a member to propound the question to the Speaker; the Speaker then to propound it to the witness; the answer to be made to the Speaker, and by him reverberated back again to the House. He asked, if the House would consent to this? If they would agree to a course of proceeding so tedious, so procrastinating, so evidently embarrassing? And yet this must be the course, unless that proposed was adopted.

It was said by a gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. R. GRISWOLD,) that we were about to appoint a committee to ransack the country for an accusation, and afterwards to search for proof to support it. He complains that no accusation is made. Mr. N. averred that an accusation was made; it was made during the last session, and again repeated during the present. He asked, if it was no charge to declare that a judge had condemned a man to the most ignominious death, without a hearing; without allowing him those benefits which he claimed under the Constitution? Was it a trivial circumstance for a member of this House to declare that a freeman had been indicted for a high capital offence; that he appeared at the bar and pleaded not guilty; that his counsel were ready to prove the truth of the plea, but that the presiding judge had refused to hear them? If this was not a charge, and a charge, too, of a most solemn nature, he did not understand the meaning of the words. It was brought forward as boldly as the gentleman from Connecticut could wish, and the only question now was, in what manner shall we inquire into the truth of it? Shall we appoint a committee to make the inquiry by calling witnesses before them, or shall we dismiss it without investigation? Shall we give it the go-by, and suffer the character of the judges to rest under an imputation so heavy? Shall we proclaim our own dishonor, by publishing abroad that a heavy charge had been made, in the face of this House, against one of the highest judicial officers of the Government, and that we were too pusillanimous to notice it?

What the gentleman meant by comparing the proposed committee to the Spanish Inquisition, Mr. N. did not really understand. Did the gentleman wish to make a false impression upon the public mind? Was he anxious to cast an odium upon the proceeding by calling it an inquisitorial committee, and affecting to believe that it was to be clothed with the powers of the Holy Inquisition? The Inquisition had the power to seize the person of the party, to deny him all access to his friends, to confine him in a cell, and refuse him all assistance whatever; to stretch him on the wheel, and rack and torture him into confession. Does the gentleman wish to induce a belief that this committee is to be clothed with the same powers? All committees appointed to inquire, might, to be sure, be called Inquisitorial, because they were to make inquiry, but the epithet of Spanish inquisition was intended to convey an idea totally incorrect.

The gentleman had asked why this charge had been suffered to rest so long? The facts upon which it was made were said to have taken place in 1800. Mr. N. thought it would be fair to reply to the gentleman that, possibly, he himself had, in some measure, accounted for the delay; the proper time had not before arrived. But if the act upon which the charge was grounded was criminal at that day, was it less so now? If Justice had slept so long, did it follow that she was dead? He hoped and trusted not. Though she had lain dormant till she was almost trampled to death, she was again roused to her accustomed vigilance, would pursue her victims, and drag them to punishment. The day of retribution, he hoped, was at hand.

The gentleman from Connecticut had declared that the proposed course was not warranted by precedent. He had noticed, but had not explained away, the precedents introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FINDLEY.) His own precedent, derived from the impeachment of Mr. Hastings, instead of being in his favor was directly against him.

In that case it was not pretended that the proof was before the House of Commons. Mr. Burke had derived his information from certain papers relative to Indian affairs, which some years before had been produced and referred to a select committee. In the year 1786, Mr. Burke rose in his place, not as a member of that committee, and charged Warren Hastings with high crimes and misdemeanors. About the same time he presented a written paper containing a specification of these charges. But this was not the impeachment. The written paper stated that as Governor General of Bengal he had disobeyed the instructions of the court of directors; that he had acknowledged himself perfectly acquainted with their wishes, but instead of obeying, had used his utmost endeavors to defeat them; and much more of an important nature. This he moved might be referred to a Committee of the whole House, in order that an inquiry might be made; and there was not a single dissenting voice. He did not adduce the proofs in the first instance, but stated his opinions that Mr. Hastings's conduct had been criminal, and demanded an inquiry. The Commons of England did not hesitate—they instantly resolved to inquire. No one was heard to declare that there was no charge, because there was no proof. Witnesses were brought to the bar and there examined by a Committee of the Whole, in support of the charges; nor was there a motion to impeach until the testimony was gone through. On the contrary, the facts proved were reported by the Committee of the Whole, who likewise expressed an opinion that Warren Hastings had been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, and ought to be impeached. The impeachment therefore was not upon the motion of Mr. Burke, but upon the report of a committee, who under the instruction of the House had made an inquiry.

What then, Mr. N. asked, was the course now proposed? His friend from Virginia had called the attention of the House to certain alleged misconduct of a judge, which had been stated by a member in his place during the last session. That statement had again been repeated in the House yesterday, not in writing, indeed, but in language so clear and in terms so unequivocal that none were so stupid as not to understand it. Like Mr. Burke, he asked that a committee should be appointed to inquire into the truth of the charge. The House of Commons had referred the subject before them to a Committee of the Whole, and the House of Representatives were moved to refer the subject before them to a select committee. A select committee was proposed, because it would be more convenient and more expeditious. If the subject might with propriety be referred to a Committee of the Whole, with equal propriety might it be referred to a select committee.

He had noticed this precedent, not because he thought it necessary to cross the Atlantic for authorities, but because the gentleman had introduced it as favoring his own doctrines. If there was already no precedent, in his opinion the House ought to make one; but he believed their own Journals would furnish them with one. At the first session of the seventh Congress, in a very few days after the House met, Mr. N. said he had risen in his place, and stated that he had seen in the public prints, during the preceding Summer, charges of a serious nature against an individual who had filled one of the highest stations under the Government, that he had misapplied considerable sums of public money, and was a defaulter to a very large amount. Upon this vague rumor, he had moved that the accounts of the former Secretary of State should be laid before the House. No gentleman then declared that it was necessary to have proof before an inquiry took place. No one dreamt that information as to facts was to be had, before it was sought for. Some indeed had asked how far the motion was to extend; whether it was to embrace all the other Secretaries of State? Others desired that the accounts from all the departments should be called for, and finally it was determined to let the resolution lie for a short time. In a few days after, on the 14th of December, he modified the resolution, in conformity with the wishes of several gentlemen, and it passed, directing that "a committee should be appointed to inquire and report, whether moneys drawn from the Treasury had been faithfully applied to the objects for which they had been appropriated, and whether they had been regularly accounted for," &c. A precedent more in point he thought could not be desired. The inquiry was produced, not upon proof, not even upon the suggestion of a member, but because a report as to the misapplication of public money had circulated through the public prints of the day. He might be told perhaps that this was an inquiry of a general nature. But general as it might be, it was directed at the conduct of individuals, and under other circumstances might have furnished materials for an impeachment. The gentleman from Connecticut was a member of that committee, and Mr. N. asked him if he would pretend to say that it was a secret committee, as he had called that now asked for? Or was this only another attempt to impose upon the public?

Another precedent, he thought, might be furnished from the Journal, but he was unwilling to refer to it.

It had been said, too, that impeachments would be cheap if they were to be made upon the suggestion of a member. It appeared to him that the motion to inquire had been constantly mistaken for a motion to impeach. Did gentlemen suppose that an impeachment must necessarily follow an inquiry? It would seem as if they entertained a poor opinion of those whose conduct was the subject of discussion. But they ought to recollect that the impeachment could not be the act of any individual, nor of the committee, but of the House; and this, too, after all the facts were collected and presented, with the evidence to support them. If this mode was not to be adopted, he did not know any other manner in which an impeachment could be instituted, unless where the President thought the peace of the country or the revenue were endangered, and gave the information himself, as in the case of Governor Blount and Judge Pickering. Nor did he think this could affect the independency of judges, unless they were to be made independent of the laws, the Constitution, and the people.

Had it not been for the debate which had taken place on this subject, he should have imagined that the friends to the judge would have been the first to promote the inquiry, after it was moved for. If he was innocent, the inquiry ought to be wished for: after passing through the ordeal, he would come out like pure gold from the crucible. If guilty, no man ought to feel a disposition to screen him from punishment. Mr. N. could not avoid on this occasion alluding to the recent conduct of a judge in a neighboring State, upon whose character an imputation of the blackest nature had been thrown by a miscreant. That judge, conscious of his own rectitude, and disdaining to shelter himself from inquiry, demanded an investigation of the charge, and the consequence was an entire and honorable acquittal.

MR. ELLIOT.—When, in the course of a late debate in this House, it was observed that a member had advanced an anti-republican sentiment, the supposed imputation was repelled by the remark, that the gentleman to whom allusion had been made, had passed a political ordeal which few had experienced, and which ought to place his character as a republican above the reach of suspicion. I have myself suffered an ordeal of that description, under circumstances of gloom and depression which have fallen to the lot of but few young men of this country; and I am far from being confident that one ordeal only will fill up the measure of my humble fortune. A more anti-republican resolution than the one upon your table, sir, I think I never saw. Reflection has confirmed me in the opinion which I expressed yesterday, that it is unprecedented, unparliamentary, and tends to the assumption, on the part of this House, of a censorial and inquisitorial power over the Judiciary, unwarranted by the Constitution. The intention and object of the mover, however, must have been extremely different; the motive is pure and the object meritorious; but that honorable gentleman, with all his talents and discernment, has, in my opinion, fallen into an error. I believe it a sound principle, that no official measures should be taken to censure or criminate the conduct of a public officer, until facts shall be stated which amount to a specific and definite charge of misconduct. In the present instance we have no written allegations, and what is the amount of the verbal information with which we are furnished? A gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated in his place that he has heard that some one of the judges, whose name appears in the resolution, was guilty of improper and oppressive conduct, in the exercise of his judicial functions, on a trial for treason some years since. And a gentleman from Virginia has stated that he has received information which induces him to believe that the inquiry he demands will lead to an impeachment. Is it our duty to act upon the vague rumors of common fame, or the opinions of individual members?

The resolution under consideration has been materially altered this morning, and I gave my vote for the alteration, because I believed that the misconduct of a court ought not to be attributed to a single judge.

I feel it my duty, Mr. Speaker, to remark, that the information which is possessed by the members of this House, respecting the conduct of those judges, is extremely contradictory. No gentleman has told us that he possesses personal knowledge of the misconduct imputed to those officers; and I possess information on the subject, derived soon after the transaction, from a source which I considered as authentic, and which produced so deep an impression upon my mind, that I should scarcely abandon my belief of its authenticity, even from the general recollection of persons who were present at the scene. I understand that the judges did nothing more or less than decide a legal question in a legal manner. They did not interdict the counsel for the prisoner from examining a question of law, but they restricted them to what they considered as their legal and Constitutional limits. They told them that the Constitution of our country had clearly and explicitly defined the crime of treason, and confined them to the plain field of the Constitution, inhibiting them from a resort to British authorities to prove that to be treason which the Constitution of our country had not made treason, or to prove that what our Constitution had made treason, was not recognised as such by foreign precedents. This statement may be incorrect, and, if it be correct, the conduct of the judges may have been improper and severe, but it cannot justify an impeachment. And if the court went farther, interrupted the counsel for the prisoner, informed them that it was the province of the court to determine points of law, declared that their opinion was fixed upon those points, and even forbade the counsel to prolong their arguments upon them, it might still be questionable whether the conduct of the court rendered its members liable to impeachment. A venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FINDLEY,) who has long been in the service of his country, has been incorrect in stating that I had observed that I would never go into the inquiry without evidence; that incorrectness must have been unintentional; if I used an expression of that description, it was a lapsus lingue; but I am confident that I said, and I am certain that I intended to say, that I thought it improper to institute the inquiry until some fact or facts should be stated as a ground of accusation. A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JACKSON) has told us that common fame is sufficient ground for impeachment in Great Britain. That gentleman has not adduced his authorities for this proposition, and, had he adduced them, I am confident they would not have answered his purpose, when contemplated in all their bearings, when examined with all their qualifications. The same gentleman also observed, if I understood him correctly, that were he satisfied that the conduct of the judges, in the case alluded to, was legal and correct, he would still vote for the inquiry. To me this declaration appears extraordinary. Why vote for an inquiry when satisfied that no criminality existed?

A gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SMILIE,) who contends that there is no necessity for precedent in the present instance, as we are competent to form precedents for ourselves, has yet thought proper to explore the books for precedents, and has presented us with the result of his labors. To guide our conduct on the present occasion, we are referred to the case of the Earl of Strafford, over whose tomb genius and virtue love to mourn, and will mourn in future ages! It cannot be possible that that gentleman wishes to recommend for our imitation that flagrant perversion of every principle of law and justice, that cruel catastrophe! A gloomy and terrible precedent, one of the most dark and disgraceful in the British annals, and utterly unsusceptible of application to the principles of a Republican form of Government. The gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. NICHOLSON,) to whom I listened with peculiar pleasure, and who has certainly displayed ingenuity, has been equally unfortunate in his selection of precedents, and in his application of them to the case under consideration. He has cited cases, which, by his own statement, militate against the principles he assumes. We are first presented with the celebrated case of Warren Hastings. In that case, a member rose in his place, and after accusing Hastings of high crimes and misdemeanors, exhibited specific charges of misconduct, in consequence of which an inquiry was instituted. Here is a solid basis, and the very basis which is wanting on the present occasion, upon which to erect the superstructure of impeachment. That gentleman has also mentioned a resolution introduced by himself in a former Congress, which was expressed in general terms, and directed to general objects, and of course was perfectly dissimilar to the present one.

Allusions have repeatedly been made to a remark of mine in the debate of yesterday, that this House is the grand inquest of the nation. It has been asked, if a grand jury were informed that a murder has been committed, would they not send for evidence to ascertain the fact? We are the grand inquest of the nation, and our practice ought, in many respects, to be analogous to that of grand juries; but in becoming that inquest, we do not entirely lose our deliberative and legislative character. I believe it would be descending from the dignity of our station, to listen to the murmurs of general rumor, and seek for guilt. I have heard that one of the judges whom we are called upon to censure, when in the exercise of his judicial functions, inquired of a jury, "Is there no sedition here? Are there no seditious newspapers within your jurisdiction?" I am ignorant whether this report be or be not founded on fact. But if it be true, let me ask, shall we not pursue a similar course by adopting the present resolution? Shall we not authorize a committee to inquire, Is there no judicial guilt abroad in our land? Is there no latent inquiry in some unexplored corner of our country? A grand jury is sworn diligently to inquire, and true presentment make, of all such offences against the laws of the land, as shall come to their knowledge. Have we taken such an oath? Are we under such obligations? And are we not about to attach to ourselves that character which gentlemen tell us is so odious, the character of common informers? I am under no fears that the stream of justice, which ought to be so pure, will become turbid, from a want of accusers, when our judges shall be guilty of crimes. When our courts shall become corrupt and despotic, patriotic motives will induce our citizens to bring forward accusations. I am also sensible of the propriety and force of the observation of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. R. GRISWOLD) that the trial in question was a transaction of great publicity, and all its circumstances must have been known to thousands of our citizens. This induces me to believe that the conduct of the court was not so oppressive and despotic as is now represented. Why has this awful charge slumbered so long?

One or two remarks upon the allusions that have been made to my observation, that we are about to assume censorial and inquisitorial powers, and I will dismiss the subject. What is the language of the resolution? Without the allegation of a single fact, it constitutes a committee to inquire whether the judges have not so acted in their official capacity as to render necessary the interposition of the Constitutional powers of this House. The expression is unequivocal; the allusion to the power of impeachment is perfectly obvious. This is what is called a petitio principii; it takes for granted, at least in some degree, what remains to be proved, that the conduct of the judges has been improper and illegal. Else why adopt a language which implies suspicion and censure? But gentlemen are alarmed at the epithet inquisitorial, and imagination teems with the horrors of the Spanish Inquisition. If the creation of this committee be an unauthorized act, if in creating it we transcend those limits which we ought, by a reasonable construction of the Constitution, to set to our own powers, it instantly becomes inquisitorial in its nature and in its operation. We must delegate to it more than general powers. We must authorize it to send for persons, and probably for papers and records. The proposition is hostile to republican principles, and, as a republican, I cannot give my vote in its favor.

MR. HOLLAND.—When I before addressed the House on this subject, I had no doubt of the charge being sufficiently explicit to found an inquiry into the conduct of the judges. My only doubt was whether it was proper to proceed without affidavit. Since yesterday, I have reflected on the course pursued in similar cases; and I will state to the House the proceedings adopted in two or three cases in the Legislature of which I was a member: In the year 1796, a charge was preferred against certain judges of the State of North Carolina for illegally extending their power. A committee was appointed to inquire into their conduct, and the result was, that the judges had exiled certain persons from the State. The proceedings did not go so far as an impeachment; for the judges wrote an explanatory letter, which gave satisfaction, and they were acquitted with honor. The other charge, to which I have alluded, was against the board of army accounts; that also was referred to a committee. The last case is the most recent. A suspicion existed that the Secretary of State had been guilty of misconduct. A letter had been received by the Governor from some citizens to that effect; in consequence of which, and of other corroborating circumstances, the Legislature appointed a committee of inquiry, of which I had the honor to be a member. That committee was empowered to send for persons and papers. There was no specific charge, but an impeachment was contemplated, if the officer should appear to be guilty. The Secretary was brought before the committee, who examined him on oath, and reported the existence of frauds much more extensive than had been imagined; in consequence of which the land office was shut up, and the Secretary notified that articles of impeachment would be exhibited against him. But the late period of the session not then admitting of a trial, it was postponed to the next General Assembly. At the succeeding Assembly the officer resigned, and superseded the necessity of an impeachment. He was afterwards indicted at common law. These precedents, drawn from the proceedings of the Legislature of the State which I have the honor to represent, induce me to think that the course proposed is proper, and I shall, accordingly, vote for the appointment of a committee of inquiry.

MR. DENNIS said, he did not rise for the purpose of entering into an investigation of the merits of the question, but principally for the purpose of stating, in a few words, what appeared to be the difference between the friends and the opponents of the resolution. He had never experienced, on any occasion, a stronger conflict between inclination and duty than in the present instance. On the one hand, he was confident that, after the official conduct of the judges had been thus publicly implicated, it must be desirable to them that an investigation of the facts charged against them should take place, and it seemed to be a duty due to those gentlemen, that they should have an opportunity of being confronted with their accusers. On the other hand, we owe to the laws and Constitution, as well as to those considerations which must always govern in the establishment of important precedents, a paramount duty, which appeared in this case irreconcilable with the indulgence of individual considerations. The true difference between the advocates and the opponents of the resolution appeared to be this: That the one thought it a proper procedure to raise an inquisitorial committee, without any definite or assignable object, and without stating in the resolution any specific charge. The other did not demand, as it had been supposed, the production of all the evidence in the outset of the proceeding, which might be necessary in the ulterior stages of the transaction, nor that precise and technical specification of the charges which might be proper in articles of impeachment, but only required that some fact should be stated, or charge alleged, as the basis on which to erect a committee. He believed, to create a committee by resolution, with general inquisitorial powers, without specifying any charge, or stating any reason in the resolution for the proceeding, was without precedent, and might become an engine of oppression. In order to satisfy the friends of the resolution on that, he did not wish to avoid that investigation which might be founded on proper principles, and which he believed, after what has been said, is rather courted than avoided by the judges in question. He would beg leave to read, in his place, the form of a resolution, such as he supposed ought to be the ground-work of a procedure like this:

"Whereas information hath been given to the House, by one of its members, that, in a certain prosecution for treason, on the part of the United States, against a certain John Fries, pending in the circuit court of the United States, in the State of Pennsylvania, Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and Richard Peters, district judge for the district of Pennsylvania, by whom the said circuit court was then holden, did inform the counsel for the prisoner that, as the court had formed their opinion upon the point of law, and would direct the jury thereupon, the counsel for the prisoner must confine themselves to the question of fact only. And whereas, it is represented that, in consequence of such determination of the court, the counsel did refuse to address the jury on the question of fact, and the said John Fries was found guilty of treason, and sentenced by the court to the punishment in such case, by the laws of the United States, provided, and was pardoned by the President of the United States."

He said he read this by way of argument, to show that the present resolution ought to be rejected, and though he would not offer it himself, in case the resolution before them should be rejected, yet he would pledge himself to vote for such an one, if the gentleman from Virginia or any other member would offer it. The resolution which has been read, embraces all the facts stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which contains the only charge that has been exhibited. But if any gentleman possesses a knowledge of any other facts or charges, let him specify them, and he would be willing to vote for an extension of the powers of the committee to them also; for he did not wish to confine the inquiry to the specific charge stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if other gentlemen had charges to exhibit, and would state them in the resolution. If they would specify a charge or charges of a serious nature, and give us any reason to believe them true, although originating from hearsay evidence, he would vote for the inquiry proposed; and he begged that he should be understood as objecting rather on the ground that no charge had been specified, than on the ground of incompetent evidence. The vague charges verbally communicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and none of which are reduced to writing, give no grounds of procedure; not only because, if true, they constitute no cause for impeachment, but because they are not specified in the resolution.

The motion was then further amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of Richard Peters, district judge of the district of Pennsylvania, and to report their opinion whether the said Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, or either of them, have so acted, in their judicial capacity, as to require the interposition of the Constitutional power of this House.

Mr. SPEAKER stated the question, that the House do agree to the said motion, as so amended, when an adjournment was called for and carried—yeas 61, nays 43.

SATURDAY January 7.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed on the memorial of Alexander Moultre, agent for the South Carolina Yazoo Company, and of William Cowan, agent of the Virginia Yazoo Company, made a report, going considerably into detail, and concluding with a resolution adverse to the prayer of the memorialist. Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday.

OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF JUDGE CHASE.

The House resumed the consideration of the question depending yesterday, at the time of adjournment, "that the House do agree to the motion of the fifth instant, as amended by the House, for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of Richard Peters, district judge of the district of Pennsylvania."

Mr. J. RANDOLPH expressed his regret that the attempt which he had made yesterday, to reply to the very personal allusions of a gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) whom he was sorry not to see in his place, had, by the adjournment, proved abortive. Such was his regard for the opinions of the House, that he should always, when called upon from a respectable quarter, justify any conduct which he deemed it proper to pursue in its deliberations. He felt it due to the respect in which he held the Chair and those around it to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut, and this consideration alone could have induced him to offer anything in addition to what he had already advanced in favor of the motion. He should otherwise have left the resolution to its fate. In that fate he did not feel himself personally implicated. If it should be rejected, he would be satisfied in having done his duty, and the House, he supposed, would feel equally satisfied in having discharged theirs. It was asked, where was the mover of this resolution at the time when the alleged misconduct took place? Did it not, said the gentleman, pass under their own eyes? Were not their deliberations held on the very spot? and why had the motion slept until this day? He hoped he should be permitted to say that it did not pass under his eyes, although he knew, at the time of the condemnation in question, he did not become acquainted with the circumstances under which it took place until long after their occurrence. It was true that the deliberations of Congress were then held in Philadelphia, the scene of this alleged iniquity, but, with other members he was employed in discharging his duties to his constituents, not in witnessing, in any court, the triumph of his principles. He could not have been so employed. It would be recollected, that the information given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania formed the ground-work of his proceedings, and he asked whether it was more the duty of the mover of the resolution to have brought it forward than every other member of the House who was a witness of the statement made by that gentleman? This information, of an official nature, given by a member in his place, of a transaction in open court, and which it was the duty of them all to have noticed, had been called a story related on hearsay; a rumor of an affair which had happened in a corner; and the House was asked if they would take such evidence as ground of proceeding, on the dictum of any one member, however great their confidence in him might be? If he really felt that respect for the House which the gentleman from Connecticut had professed, he would not have insulted their understandings by such language. He would not have stood up, as amicus curæ, to prevent their being precipitated into absurdity and injustice by an influential member of their body. That, however, was the station which the gentleman had assumed, and he hoped the duties of it would be discharged with the fidelity which they required. After clothing himself with this character, Mr. R. said he expected to have seen him at his post—he regretted that he did not see him there, and that his duty did not permit him to withhold the observations which he was compelled to make. Whilst, however, the gentleman was engaged in discharging the new and important function with which he stood self-invested, he seemed cautious of replying to the masterly statement of his venerable friend from Pennsylvania, and which he believed had remained unanswered because it was unanswerable. It must, said Mr. R., be a subject of high gratification to us all, and I congratulate this House upon it, that age has not yet dimmed the lustre of those talents which have so long presided in the councils of this country. And if the time shall come when we are to resign our understandings and place ourselves under the direction of an individual, I hope to be permitted to range myself under the banners of that tried patriot, and not under those of the gentleman from Connecticut. In the same spirit with which he challenged the confidence of the House, as a friend unwilling to see them led into error and absurdity, that gentleman had endeavored to alarm their pride by representing the motion as a demand made upon them. It was so. It was (if he might so express it) a writ of right, not of favor—and as such he demanded it, as such he urged it. But an objection was taken that no act of misconduct had been alleged. With his friend from Maryland he would say that, a fact of the first importance had been adduced, on which he was sorry his friend had not dwelled longer. It could not receive too much attention. On a trial for life and death, the jury, who were the Constitutional judges both of the law and fact, were deprived of the right of a discussion of the point of law, "what constitutes treason?" The rights of the jury and of the accused were equally invaded. It was conduct not dissimilar to this, in a case of libel, which drew forth from the English Parliament the famous declaratory bill of Mr. Fox. Lord Mansfield had laid down the doctrine that the jury had a right to decide only upon the bare facts of printing and publishing, and not upon the question of guilt, which was compounded of the law and the fact. This produced the declaratory act, which passed a strong censure on the practices of courts—since it did not amend or alter the law, but declared what the law was—and established the point resisted by the court, that the jury was the judge both of the fact and of the law. If, then, on a question of criminal law, where the punishment was only fine and imprisonment, the conduct of a judge was deemed highly reprehensible in encroaching upon the rights of the jury, what shall we say of him who usurps those rights in a case of life and death, in a case of treason? This denial to the prisoner and the jury of the right of having the point of law discussed, seemed to be the first step towards assuming those powers in cases of treason the exercise of which, in case of libel, had drawn down upon the English courts the censure of their Parliament. Would the gentlemen say this was nothing? Would he affirm that if a man were under trial for murder, the court would be justified in saying to his counsel, You may, if you can, disprove the fact, with which the prisoner stands charged, but you shall not endeavor to show that it does not amount to the crime with which he stands charged? If you admit the killing you shall not argue the point that such killing does not constitute murder. Would the gentleman contend that treason is better defined than murder? What is murder? Killing with malice aforethought; can any definition be clearer? What is burglary? Breaking in during the night. What is treason? The Constitution defines it as levying war against the United States; adhering to their enemies; giving them aid and comfort. But what had definitions to do with the case? Because murder was defined, had counsel ever been stopped in an attempt to show that the killing with which their client stood charged was not a killing with prepense malice, a killing which constituted murder? What was more common than to see the facts admitted, and the crime not only denied, but disproved to the satisfaction of the jury; and upon what principle shall counsel be arrested in the attempt to show that the facts charged in an indictment for treason do not amount to such a levying of war, or an adherence or aid to such enemies as would constitute treason? Mr. R. said that the fact mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was of a remarkable nature. He had never heard of a similar proceeding, and he rejoiced that another instance of so black a nature could not probably be furnished by any tribunal in this country.

The gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. DENNIS,) however, had entirely abandoned the ground taken by his friend. He agrees that there is a charge of an important nature exhibited, and if it was incorporated into the resolution, and the inquiry confined to that subject only, he would vote for it. The object of the one gentleman was only to confine the inquiry, whilst that of his friend was to deny it altogether. He could not thank the gentleman for his liberality. He would have what he asked or nothing. He would never consent to confine the inquiry; if it could not be full and free, let it be denied.

The gentleman from Maryland had, with very little dexterity, endeavored to confound the resolution of inquiry with the articles of impeachment which may follow from it, and said that if the House would consent to confine the inquiry to any particular charge he would vote for it. It was true that after articles of impeachment should have been exhibited against the accused, the House would not be permitted to prefer any new accusation, or to adduce testimony to prove any guilt other than that which was charged in those articles. In the same manner as when a criminal was indicted, evidence would not be suffered to be brought forward to prove any act of criminality not contained in some one of the counts of the indictment. But would gentlemen persist in confounding things so entirely different, as to confine an incipient inquiry by the same rigid rules which would govern a criminal trial? It was trifling with the judgment of the House. The gentleman was eager for inquiring, but the charge must be incorporated into the resolution, and the inquiry confined to a specific point, before he could be brought to consent to it. Whatever other misdemeanors might come to the knowledge of the committee in the course of the investigation, he would not agree to have them reported to the House. And at the same time he told them of the struggle between his inclination and his sense of duty—his inclination as a friend of the accused to grant the inquiry, his duty as a member of the House and a friend of justice to refute it. Mr. R. was sorry to find the gentleman in this awkward predicament; he regretted that it was out of his power to gratify him by narrowing the inquiry. This, his duty would not suffer him to do. He hoped, however, the strength of the gentleman's constitution would carry him through the arduous struggle in which he was involved, by his wishes on the one hand, and his principles on the other.

Whilst so much was said on the subject of precedent, he hoped he might offer a few cases to their consideration. He did not come to the House armed with precedents. Neither his health nor leisure permitted him to search for them. Gentlemen of greater industry, and who attached more importance to them than himself, had furnished him with them. For his part he thought precedents had nothing to do with the case, but for the sake of those who thought differently, he would show the course which he advocated was not destitute even of their support. Here Mr. R. referred to Mr. Hatsell's precedents. "On the 21st of April, 1626, Mr. Glanville, from the select committee appointed to consider of the charges against the Duke of Buckingham, reports that, they desire the House will resolve whether common fame is a ground for this House to proceed upon?" It is resolved to consider this the next day. After a long debate the House resolve that, "common fame is good ground of proceeding of this House, either to inquire of here, or to transmit the complaint, if the House find cause, to the King or Lords."

Mr. R. begged to call the attention of the House to the opinion of a gentleman, delivered during this debate, to which he must be permitted to attach more importance than to that of the gentleman from Connecticut. When he mentioned the name of Selden, he believed he should stand justified in the opinion of the gentleman himself, and in that of his warmest admirers. "These cases (said Mr. Selden) are to be ruled by the law of Parliament and not by the common or civil law." Mr. Littleton says, "this is not a House for definitive judgment, but for information, denunciation, or presentment, for which common fame is sufficient." Mr. Noy says, "There are two questions—first, Whether a common fame? Second, Whether this fame be true? We will not transmit without the first inquiry: but without the second we may; for peradventure we cannot come by the witnesses; as if the witnesses be in the Lords' House."

Again, "on the 16th October, 1667, the House being informed "that there have been some innovations of late in the trials of men for their lives and deaths, and in some particular cases restraints have been put upon juries, the matter is referred to a committee." This case (Mr. R. said) was precisely in point. "On the 18th of November, this committee are empowered 'to receive information against the Lord Chief Justice Keeling, for any other misdemeanors besides those concerning juries." Thus on a particular fact, innovation in trials for life and death, a committee was raised, and yet they were not confined to the examination of that single charge, but empowered to inquire generally into the misconduct of the judge. A stronger or more pointed precedent could not be conceived.

By the Constitution, Mr. Randolph said, that House was vested with the sole power of impeachment. How this power was to be exercised must depend on their discretion, and on no other law or principle whatever: for "these cases are not to be ruled by the common or civil law, but by the law of Parliament" That law of Parliament it remained with them to establish. It could not be matter of surprise that he, one of the leading principles of whose politics it was to support the weight of that branch of the Government, and to be jealous of Executive influence—it could not surprise any one, that he should exert himself in behalf of the Constitutional rights of that House. When he saw the importance which was attached to precedent, he was more than ever solicitous for that which they were then about to establish. He trusted that they would not consent to abridge the power with which the Constitution had invested them—to reduce it below the standard which the English House of Commons had fixed as the measure of their own power in similar cases. A time might come when a wicked President and his flagitious Ministers might so conduct themselves in office, as to make every man regret the proceedings of that day, in case they should suffer their power to sleep. The refusing to exercise it, then, would hereafter be adduced as a denial of its existence. Such might be the circumstances of the times, that no private man would dare to step forward with a specific charge against the Executive. If they should deny an inquiry without a specific charge, they would do all in their power to screen such a President and such Ministers at a future day. It had been remarked that, in this Government, an officer found guilty, on an impeachment, could not be punished capitally. The sentence could only remove him from office, and disqualify him, for ever after, from holding one under the United States. If, in a country where the accused may be brought to the block, free, unfettered inquiry is warranted against any rank however exalted—would it be denied here, where the punishment was comparatively light? Should they hold the other departments of the Government more inviolable than they were considered even in England? Would they afford to a criminal, Executive or Judiciary, a shelter denied by the laws of that Government? He hoped they would not. He trusted that they would give an example of their readiness to bring every offender to justice, however great might be his station.

Mr. GRIFFIN.—I had hoped that no subject would have been agitated during this session which should have interrupted the tranquillity or disturbed the harmony of this House, so necessary to the faithful and correct discharge of our public duties; but, sir, I perceive, from the turn which the debate upon the resolution now before the House has taken, that sensations have been excited which I fear it will be difficult to allay.

The proposition now before the House, nursed with so much secrecy, and forced on us so suddenly and unexpectedly, comes in such a questionable shape, that I must beg the attention of the House for a few moments while "I speak to it."

What, sir, does the resolution demand of us? That a committee be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, &c. But how is this inquiry to be conducted? Are there any data by which the committee are to be guided? Is there any specific charge to which their attention or inquiries are to be directed? None. And who, sir, before this enlightened day ever heard of a committee of inquiry being raised, without possession of a single subject to direct or guide the inquiry? What, sir, erect an inquiring committee vested with all the powers of a Star Chamber, and yet assign them no specific objects of their duty! But, sir, the official conduct of these judges has given offence—and are we now, sir, to probe and search the whole judicial lives of these gentlemen, for causes of complaint and censure? Are the records of the States of Maryland and Pennsylvania now to be ransacked, for evidences of their guilt and cause of impeachment? I never have and never shall deny the right of this House, to inquire into the conduct of public officers—but, sir, if the honorable mover of the resolution is serious—

[Here Mr. RANDOLPH interrupted, and desired the gentleman to explain his meaning by the word serious.]

Mr. GRIFFIN continued. I will answer the gentleman: my meaning is, that if the gentleman believes there are just grounds for impeachment—if he is in possession of information or facts, let him declare them, and if they appear to my mind to be sufficient whereon to ground an impeachment, let him demand it and I will join with him. Let him specify the instances of malfeasance of which these judges have been guilty, and I will unite with him—let him declare the malconduct of these public functionaries, and I will cordially co-operate with him. If these judges have travelled beyond the line of their duty, if they have wantonly exceeded the limits of their power, I will aid in the infliction of such punishment as they may merit; but, sir, I cannot, I will not, in this indirect manner, wound the feelings or censure the characters of men, holding high responsible offices under your Government. Could I induce myself to believe that the course now proposed to be pursued is correct, I will gladly give it my assent; but for reasons very different from those the advocates of this measure adduce: could I deem it correct I would support the resolution because I believe the characters implicated therein will safely pass the ordeal preparing for them, and that the inquiry will redound to their honor. I would cheerfully support the resolution, because, by the impeachment which I predict will follow, an opportunity will be offered to remove that load of unmerited calumny under which the Federal Judiciary of the United States have too long labored, and with which our public prints have been long filled. But the course is incorrect—the measure in its present shape appears to me to be fraught with incalculable mischief to our country, and I never will assist in the establishment of a precedent which may at some future day be made an engine of persecution, as “wicked as intolerant.” Mr. Speaker, let me ask of you, sir, to remember the consequences which may flow from the adoption of this resolution—let me conjure this House to reflect upon the dreadful effects which must arise to us, if, upon the bare assertion of a single gentleman, unsupported by any direct allegation, a committee of this nature shall be raised, a precedent of this kind established, what public character will be safe? nay, sir, how soon may not we ourselves feel its baneful influence? Far be it from me, sir, to impute to the honorable mover of the resolution any impurity of motives. I believe his conduct has proceeded from a consciousness of duty, and from a similar consciousness of duty I must oppose the measure. I cannot deny the power of this House to adopt the resolution upon your table, but I beg of you to pause ere you take the fatal step, and do not, because “dressed with a little brief authority, play such fantastic tricks before high heaven as make e’en angels weep.”

Sir, I have endeavored to discharge what I conceived to be my duty upon this occasion, and when experience shall fatally convince us of the dreadful effects of the precedent we are now about to establish, I shall derive consolation from the reflection, that I lent my feeble aid to check the overwhelming torrent.

Mr. EUSTIS said, he did not view this subject in the same light with the gentleman last up; he did not see those awful consequences which he had pointed out. He hoped the time would never come, when an inquiry into the conduct of an officer of the Government should be deemed a subject of alarm in that House. It was the first principle of the Constitution, that every man was amenable to the Constitution and laws of his country, and however elevated any one might be, that he could not be raised above the reach of inquiry. The observations of the gentleman who had last spoken, and of others who had preceded him, were predicated on a principle that was not correct. If the resolution on the table was to impeach the judge, those observations would be relevant, but they were incorrect on the preliminary motion to inquire.

In making up, said Mr. E., my judgment on this subject, I have endeavored altogether to avoid the inquiry, whether the officer implicated in this resolution, has so conducted himself as to require impeachment by this House. I have not accepted the opinion of the mover of the resolution, and I have excluded all the other information adduced in the debate; because I consider it as alone applicable to the question of impeachment, which is not now before the House. The question before the House is a very different one, and, in my opinion, it is plain and simple. What is it? It is that a committee be raised to inquire into the official conduct of a certain public officer. When a member of this House, under the obligations of honor, and the additional obligations of an oath, rises and takes upon himself the responsibility of moving an inquiry into the official conduct of a public officer, which can only be effected in virtue of the impeaching power of this House, which power it exclusively possesses, I view the request for an inquiry in the nature of an information laid before the House as the grand inquest of the nation.

When this proposition was made, the mind of every gentleman was naturally cast about for the situation of the officers in question. If it shall be the opinion of the House that their conduct is such as to afford grounds for an impeachment, it will be granted that it is an indispensable duty to make the inquiry. If, on the other hand, the House are of opinion that no testimony can be produced which will lead to an impeachment, then it is due to the officers to institute an inquiry. The object of inquiry is two-fold—arising from the duty to the people, and that due to the officer whose conduct is impeached. If gentlemen are of opinion that, in this case, there are no grounds for impeachment, then it is clear that the conduct and character of the officer ought to be vindicated, and the inquiry instituted to afford him the means. If they are of opinion that there are grounds for an impeachment, then the duty they owe to the people urges them to the inquiry. In the Constitution I find no excuse, no justification, on which to ground a refusal to institute an inquiry into the conduct of any public officer charged with misbehaviour.

To such an inquiry, what is objected? That the power may be abused. Indeed, the objection is, that it is abused in this instance. How abused? To argue from abuse of the power against the use of it, is no argument at all. If the House believe either alternative I have mentioned, and one or the other you must believe, it is their duty to make the inquiry. But it is said that the committee are to be clothed with power to send for persons and papers. Granted. That power is indispensably necessary. It is said their powers are to be inquisitorial. This is not true. Will not the committee be accessible by every member of the House, and what are their ulterior powers but to collect facts, and to express an opinion whether they afford grounds for an impeachment? That opinion they will eventually submit to the House, and, without its approbation, it will be settled.

It is further said that no specific charge is adduced, and if there were, gentlemen say they would vote for the inquiry. But if a specific charge were made, I ask if any member would be enabled to give a more enlightened vote than on the present resolution? I consider the general power to inquire as most important, and that it is the duty of the House, on such occasions as the present, to enlarge rather than to narrow the field of inquiry.

It is further said that this course of proceeding will discourage respectable men from accepting the offices of Government. But certainly every officer, from the President to the most menial, knows that he holds his office subject to inquiry, to impeachment, and to punishment, in case of criminality.

If the House do not pursue the present course, from what quarter are they to expect the origination of an inquiry? Is it to be supposed that it will come from the citizen, when his life and fortune are probably at the disposal of particular officers charged with misconduct. This line of inquiry ought, in my opinion, to be courted and encouraged; more especially in this instance, after the course which the debate has taken, and after specific charges have been adduced. The debate has given an importance to the inquiry, which its original merits may not, perhaps, have entitled it to.

When this subject was first introduced, it appeared to me novel, and that there were no precedents in point under the Federal Government. It is time that this precedent should be established. It is time that every officer should know that this House is ready at any time to inquire into his official conduct, if charged with misbehaviour; and instead of declining the inquiry, in this instance, from a false delicacy to the officer, it becomes the House to embrace the resolution and make the inquiry. If evidence shall be collected, and it appears that there are no grounds for impeachment, the officer will be restored to the public confidence, and will be acquitted. If, on the other hand, it appears that he has been guilty of malfeasance in office, a duty will be imposed upon the House, from which they cannot recede, to bring him to trial.

MR. THATCHER.—As gentlemen seem to consider the decision of the court in the trial of Fries as unprecedented, I beg leave to refer them to the cases of the United States versus Vigol, and the same versus Mitchell, 2 Dallas's Reports, 346 to 357. They will find that the decision of the court, in the case of Fries, was exactly conformable to cases adjudged in 1795. Without troubling the House with the whole of those cases, I beg leave to read the decision of the court in the last case. "The charge of the court, says the reporter, 'was delivered to the jury in substance as follows. 'Patterson justice. 'The first question to be considered is, what was the general object of the insurrection? If its object was to suppress the excise offices, and to prevent the execution of an act of Congress, by force and intimidation, the offence, in legal estimation, is high treason: it is an usurpation of the authority of Government; it is high 'treason by levying of war.'" The decision, sir, is also conformable to the English authorities. The charge then against Judge Chase and Judge Peters, after divesting it of the coloring which imagination has given it, amounts to this—that, in the trial of Fries for treason, the court prevented the counsel from arguing to the jury against a point of law long settled by that and other courts of the United States. I have attended closely to the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (MR. SMILIE,) and I believe I am correct.

The very point which the counsel of Fries would have argued to the jury, was that which had long before been settled by the courts of the United States. I contend, sir, that this court did no more than they had a right to do—no more than is practised by every well regulated court. They prevented counsel from arguing law in the face of the authorities, and of the opinion of the court. That this is usual, I appeal to gentlemen of the law who are present. This, sir, is the only fact stated to the House upon which the motion is founded.

The gentleman from Virginia (MR. RANDOLPH) has said, that he has been informed of facts, which convince him that an inquiry ought to be made. But that gentleman has not stated to the House what those facts are.

It has been contended that where a member of this House shall state that he is convinced that an inquiry ought to be made, the House ought to institute such an inquiry. Precedents have been adduced to prove that this has been done in the British Parliament. There certainly has been no case cited where an inquiry has been commenced upon the motion without stating his facts or his evidence. But whatever may have been the practice in England I can never consent to vote upon any impressions or convictions but my own.

If the official conduct of the judges upon the trial of Fries was such as to require the interposition of this House (why, as the gentleman from Connecticut, MR. GRISWOLD, has asked) why was not this inquiry sooner announced? This trial, I am told, was in February, 1800. It took place, within the hearing of Congress. It was the subject of universal attention. Why has it slept four years? Upon what ground shall we invest a committee with power to ransack the country for charges against our judges? Shall we, upon the motion of a member—shall we, upon the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (MR. SMILIE,) commence an inquiry, troublesome and expensive—an inquiry, which must attach suspicion to the official conduct of the judges? Sir, I respect the conduct of the gentlemen who attempt to remove obstructions from the stream of justice, but I must be convinced that obstructions now exist, before I can vote for this resolution.

MR. EARLY.—Like other gentlemen who have gone before me in this discussion, I do not consider myself at liberty to vote against the resolution on the table. Like them, I deem myself bound to vote for an inquiry into the conduct of any public officer, when that inquiry is demanded by a member of this House. After the view taken of the merits of this measure by the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Virginia, I did expect that all further opposition to it would have ceased. In this expectation I have been disappointed.

JANUARY, 1804.

Official Conduct of Judge Chase.

H. OF R.

I feel constrained to vote in favor of this resolution, because I believe that the inquiry it contemplates is an act of justice due to the people of the United States on one hand, and to the characters of the individuals charged, on the other. A charge of high crimes and misdemeanors has been made on this floor against two individuals, and two members of this House have demanded an inquiry into their official conduct. To this demand may be added the weight of public opinion. I am apprized of the delicacy of this ground, and when I resort to it, it is my wish to be understood as meaning that when charges of a high nature are instituted and reiterated from one end of the Union to the other, so as to create a general belief, so as to destroy confidence in the principle and integrity of those who administer justice, and to beget a suspicion that justice cannot be obtained equally by all men; under such circumstances the public voice demands an inquiry into the truth of the charges. Is this a fact, or is it not, in relation to the officers implicated in this resolution? I presume that it is the fact to a great extent will not be denied. Every gentleman on this floor, in the habit of reading the public prints, must have had so forcible an impression made on his mind on this subject, as not to have lost a recollection of the conduct charged upon one of the judges named in this resolution, in the case of Fries, Cooper, and Callender. I cannot, therefore, refuse my assent to the inquiry, because I believe it due to the public, as well as to the individuals charged with the improper conduct, and who, if they were on the spot, would undoubtedly memorialize us for an inquiry. Indeed one of the officers referred to in the resolution, if conscious of his innocence, ought, in my opinion, long since, to have demanded an inquiry into his official conduct, when he witnessed the strong and numerous charges against him in the public prints from one end of the Continent to the other.

It is objected to this resolution that no proof has been adduced to the House of the truth of the allegations preferred. In my mind there is all the difference that can be imagined between an inquiry and an impeachment; and almost all the arguments urged on this occasion apply exclusively to an impeachment. A strong proof of this has been given by the gentleman who has just sat down. That gentleman (Mr. R. GRISWOLD) has taken this remarkable ground, that this House ought not to inquire without proof. I suppose he meant, by proof, the depositions of witnesses; this is, in other words, saying that we, whose Constitutional duty it is to inquire, may omit to do it, because they whose duty it is not to inquire, have not done it.

The present resolution is nothing more than this: A certain officer of the Government is charged, in the face of the nation, with malfeasance in office, and a committee appointed to inquire into the truth of the charge. Gentlemen allege that the committee is to be appointed to inquire what accusations can be found, and then for testimony to sustain them. But this is not so. The accusations have been long since made, and they are not of a day, but of a year's standing.

The analogy between the functions of this House and a grand jury, is correct and forcible. Before a grand jury, it is the right of any individual to apply for and demand an inquiry into the conduct of any person within their cognizance; and it is more especially the right of any member of the jury to make such a demand; and it is their bounden duty, according to their oaths, to make the inquiry when so demanded.

The official conduct of the judges I view as more delicate and important than that of any other description of officers; for, on their impartiality the whole people of the United States depend for obtaining justice in ordinary cases, and individuals depend, in the last resort, for the preservation of their lives. Their official conduct should, therefore, not only be correct, but likewise free from suspicion. Simply to be charged ought to produce an inquiry; and I must confess that a recent case, in which the integrity of a judicial officer was impeached, excited my warmest approbation. I mean the case of a judge (Judge Tucker) in a neighboring State, who, on a suggestion believed by no man, deemed it a duty to himself and his country to demand an inquiry into his conduct.

Another view, by no means unimportant, which may be taken, is, that the reputation of the Government, of which the judges are a component part, demands the inquiry in question. Will any gentleman pretend to say that reputation is not at stake? that it is not affected at home or abroad by the charges which have been so long and so loudly made? I presume not. Whether those charges are true or not, is not the question; for, whether true or not, so long as they are generally believed the reputation of the Government is affected; its reputation for impartial justice is affected, and deeply too. To refuse this inquiry would be to give weight to this impression abroad—to add to the suspicion, at home and abroad, that impartial justice is not done to all men. Let us, then, make the inquiry, and restore the reputation of the Government, by inflicting a proper punishment upon these officers, if guilty, and, if innocent, by proving the charges against them calumnies.

Mr. EPPES.—If, in adopting the resolution before us, we were to attach odium to the characters in question, I should feel no surprise at the course pursued by the gentlemen who oppose this inquiry. In this country the official conduct of every man is, and ought to be, subject to examination. It is not the examination, but the result of that examination, which attaches merit or demerit to a public character. In a Government like ours no principle ought to be cherished with greater care than a free inquiry into the conduct of public officers. So friendly am I to this principle in its fullest extent, so necessary do I believe it to be to the preservation of that purity in public officers essential to a Republic, that it will always be sufficient for me to vote an inquiry, for a member to declare he considers an inquiry necessary. A proper regard to his own reputation will always, I am certain, prevent any member of this House from calling on us to exercise this important duty on light or trivial grounds. As to the extensive field of inquiry to which this doctrine may lead, I care not; and whenever a member of this House shall rise in his place and declare that he considers an inquiry into the conduct of a public officer or officers necessary, I shall be ready to pass the whole circle in review, to begin with the first and end with the last, to vote an inquiry into the conduct of each, and even to go further, to vote an impeachment if necessary. I shall on every such occasion consider it a duty I owe to the individual accused, and to the community in whose behalf the accusation is made, to vote an inquiry.

H. OF R.

Official Conduct of Judge Chase.

Thus much for the general principle which would induce me to vote for this resolution if no specific charge had been made. In the present case, however, a specific charge of a serious kind has been made by a member from Pennsylvania; and, however gentlemen may have attempted to weaken the force of this charge, it does substantially amount to this: that, by the opinion of a judge, a citizen of the United States was deprived of his Constitutional right to counsel, when arraigned for his life. I will not, however, dwell on this charge. It has been placed by a gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NICHOLSON) in a point of view satisfactory to myself, and, I believe, to the House. I consider it, however, my duty on this occasion to mention a trial which took place in the Commonwealth of Virginia, which affords another specific charge against Judge Chase. I was not present at this trial, and am not personally acquainted with the circumstances. I believe, however, that in the Commonwealth of Virginia but one sentiment prevails as to the conduct of Judge Chase on this occasion, viz: that it was indecent and tyrannical. In the course of the trial he refused to allow a witness on the part of the prisoner to be examined, because the witness could prove the truth of a part only, and not the whole of the words laid in the indictment. By a system of conduct peculiar to himself, he deprived the prisoner of the aid of Mr. George Hay, as counsel, a man, who, although not as generally known as some others in our State, is inferior to none in his profession. I do not mention these circumstances as hearsay evidence, but as facts, which I am induced to believe can be established by legal testimony. If, on this statement, there is any gentleman who can refuse an inquiry, I am willing to leave him in the enjoyment of his opinion. For my own part, I shall be always ready, on the demand of any member of this House, to exercise my Constitutional right of inquiry, and, without partiality or prejudice, pursue the course pointed out by my duty, whether it shall lead to impeachment or an honorable acquittal.

Mr. NICHOLSON rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to precedents. When he yesterday addressed them he had thought it unnecessary to introduce authorities from foreign nations; but as they had been insisted on by the opponents to the resolution, he would refer to two or three; and he was more solicitous to do so at the present moment, as he saw a gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) about to rise, and he wished to call the gentleman's attention to them, in order that he might remark on them, and show, if it was to be done, that they did not apply to the case under consideration. If gentlemen would refer to the powers exercised by the Commons of England, for time almost immemorial, and to those exercised by the several State Legislatures, he believed that precedents innumerable would be furnished. The Commons of England were the grand inquest of the nation. As such it was their duty to inquire into the official conduct of all those entrusted with the powers of Government. Every officer in the realm was liable to impeachment by them. The same principle would be found to run through the constitutions of most of the States, and it was wisely introduced into the Constitution of the United States. The power to impeach is admitted to be in the House of Representatives, and the only question is, as to the manner in which this power shall be exercised. The proposed method is called a loose one, and we are asked to show some precedent for it. The House of Commons at the commencement of every session appoint what is there called a committee of grievances and courts of justice. Many of the State Legislatures appoint a similar committee annually, and, in the State from which he came, the House of Delegates always appoint a committee of grievances and courts of justice. It was one of their standing committees, and the appointment was as regular and as usual as the appointment of a committee of claims in this House. What then he inquired was the duty, what the authority of this committee? In England, in Maryland, and in every other State where it exists, it is their duty to inquire into the conduct of every officer of the Government, to call witnesses before them to prove official misconduct, to report offences to the House from which their powers are derived, and recommend the proper measures to be adopted.

This House, like the Commons of England, and the most numerous branch in the State Legislatures, is the grand inquest of the nation; they are to inquire into crimes and bring offenders to justice. It had not, he said, heretofore been customary for the House to appoint a committee of grievances and courts of justice, but he believed no man would deny the power, and when appointed they would not only have the authority proposed to be in this committee, but one infinitely more extensive. They would have the right to inquire into the conduct of all civil officers, and to report such facts as might come to their knowledge. If, then, we could, with propriety, and agreeably to precedent, authorize an inquiry into the conduct of several hundred officers, could it be denied that the same precedent would warrant an inquiry into the conduct of two only? In 5th Comyn's Digest, page 204, it would be found that a committee of grievances and justice was one of their standing committees, and in page 205 it was declared that they might "summon any judges and examine them in person, upon complaint of any misdemeanor in office." He presumed it had not been thought necessary heretofore to appoint a general committee of this kind, but at present the necessity was apparent, as a complaint had been made to the House of the official misconduct of two judges. Again, in the same book, page 209, it is said, "The Commons are the general inquisitors of the realm, and therefore if a Lord, spiritual or temporal, commit oppression, bribery, extortion, &c., the Commons shall inquire of it, and if, by the vote of the House, the crime appears to have been committed, they transmit it, with the evidence, to the Lords." This, he said, would clearly show, what indeed he thought common sense would teach every man, that the inquiry should be made before proof was exhibited upon which an impeachment was to be grounded. In the same page it would be seen that "common fame is a sufficient ground of a proceeding in the House of Commons by inquiry, or by a complaint, if need be, to the King or Lords." And Rushworth's Historical Collection, page 217, is cited, it is said by some of the ablest lawyers of that day that "if common fame were not to be admitted as public accusers, great men would be the only safe ones, as no private man would venture to complain of them." Mr. N. referred to these authorities at that particular stage of the discussion, as he was desirous of giving gentlemen an opportunity of commenting upon them. As he had no wish to prolong the debate, he would not multiply observations upon that point, but could not sit down without noticing what had fallen from a gentleman from Massachusetts, in which he had again attempted to vindicate the conduct of the judges upon the trial of Fries.

The gentleman had referred to a case in Dallas' Reports, respecting the Western Insurrection, in which he says the point of law determined upon the trial of Fries, had been previously settled by one of the federal courts, and from thence infers that Mr. Chase and Mr. Peters were justified in preventing counsel from arguing it a second time. That such conduct might be perhaps excusable in a civil cause he was not prepared to deny; but, in a case of criminal jurisdiction, involving the guilt or innocence of a man whose life was to be the forfeit, he held it totally unjustifiable.

All men, he said, were acquainted with the circumstances of what was generally called the Western Insurrection. Some of the Western counties of Pennsylvania were opposed to the excise law. A considerable majority of the people had resolved to oppose its execution, and took strong measures to prevent individuals from accepting offices under it, and compelled some of them to resign the places to which they had been appointed. While they professed an attachment to the Government of the Union they resolved to resist the execution of one of its laws. Among these was a man by the name of Mitchell, and he was charged with high treason before the circuit of Pennsylvania in which Judge Paterson then presided. A doubt existed whether the resistance to the execution of a law, even by force of arms, was such a levying of war within the meaning of the Constitution, as amounted to treason. What was the conduct of the judge on that occasion? He had no disposition to preclude inquiry. He had no wish to keep the jury in ignorance by forbidding fair and open argument. On the contrary, it appeared from a note on page 348 that he called the attention of the prisoner's counsel to the point and requested that they would notice it in their observations. This was done before the defence was opened, and he said he should beg leave to read a part of the argument made in favor of the prisoner.

"The counsel for the prisoner (E. Tilghman and Thomas) premised that they did not conceive it to be their duty to show that the prisoner was guiltless of any description of crime against the United States, or the State of Pennsylvania, but they contended that he had not committed the crime of high treason, and ought, therefore, to be acquitted on the present indictment. The adjudications in England upon the various descriptions of treason, had been worked, incautiously, into a system, by the destruction of which the Government itself would be seriously affected; but even there, the best judges and the ablest commentators, while they acquiesce in the decisions that have already taken place, furnish a strong caution against the too easy admission of future cases, which seem to have a parity of reason. Constructive and interpretive treasons must be the dread and scourge of any nation that allows them—1 Hale, P. C., 132, 259—4 Black. Com., 85. Take, then, the distinction of treason by levying war, as laid down by the attorney of the district, and it is a constructive or interpretive weapon which is calculated to annul all distinctions heretofore wisely established in the grades and punishments of crimes, and by whose magic power a mob may be easily converted into a conspiracy, and a riot aggravated into high treason."

Such, he said, was the opinion of two gentlemen ranking high in their profession, and who would not be charged with having any feeling toward the offence or the offender inconsistent with the rights or interests of the Government. The whole argument was too lengthy to be read to the House, but he considered it well worth the perusal of every American. Able as it was, however, it had not the wished for weight with the court. Judge Paterson gave the following charge to the jury: "The first question is, what was the general object of the insurrection? If its object was to suppress the excise offices, and to prevent the execution of an act of Congress, by force and intimidation, the offence, in legal estimation, is high treason; it is an usurpation of the authority of Government; it is high treason by levying of war." Sir, said Mr. N., this opinion of the court may have been honest; I mean not to impeach the purity of motive which dictated it, but I mean to show that the offence with which Mitchell was charged, the resistance to the execution of a law, was not considered as treason by the highest existing authority of this country. Mitchell was pardoned by the President of the United States, and Congress, not long after, expressed their opinion on the subject in the most ample manner.

The trial of Mitchell which I have just quoted took place in 1795, and in 1798 the subject was taken up by Congress, who by the act of the 14th of July, 1798, provided that the resistance to the execution of a law should be considered a high misdemeanor only, punishable by fine and imprisonment. The act is in these words: "If any persons shall unlawfully combine or conspire together, with intent to oppose any measure or measures of the Government of the United States which are, or may be directed by proper authority, or to impede the operation of any law of the United States, or to intimidate or prevent any person holding a place or office in or under the Government of the United States, from undertaking, performing, or executing his trust or duty, he or they shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 and by imprisonment during a term not less than six months nor exceeding five years." Here, sir, the resistance to the execution of a law is declared to be a high misdemeanor only, punishable by fine and imprisonment. Fries was tried in 1800, two years after the passage of this law. The offence of which he had been guilty was rescuing prisoners from the marshal by force, thereby, in the language of the act, "preventing an officer of the United States from performing and executing his duty," and it was to show that he was punishable under this act by fine and imprisonment only, that his counsel were desirous of bringing the law before the jury. This, however, the court refused; the man was convicted of high treason, and was sentenced to a most ignominious death. Let such conduct be vindicated where and by whom it may, I must declare that it can never meet my approbation.

Mr. DANA.—It is to be regretted, Mr. Speaker, that a resolution so novel and of so much importance as that on the table was not postponed, at least for one day after it was presented to the House. Had this been done, gentlemen might have had some opportunity deliberately to examine the subject, before they were required to make a decision. But as the resolution was moved without giving any previous notice, and has been pressed upon us immediately after it was moved, I do not feel myself prepared, as I could have wished to be on such a question, before attempting to deliver my sentiments in this House. Unprepared, however, as I am, I request your indulgence while I offer a few remarks.

I will first attend to some precedents mentioned by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. NICHOLSON.) He has stated that it has been usual in the English House of Commons to appoint a committee for courts of justice, with power to inquire into the proceedings of courts, and for this purpose to call persons before them for examination. But, sir, is not such a committee appointed for general purposes, not directed against any individual, and therefore not affecting the character of any magistrate? Their powers relate to the judicial system generally, and do not implicate any one of the judicial officers. Does the resolution on the table propose a committee of this kind? On the contrary, it is explicitly directed against two of the judges. If gentlemen would justify their proceedings by the practice of the British House of Commons, let the resolution be made to have a general reference to all the courts, instead of being pointed as it now is, against particular persons. In its present form it departs essentially from the principle of the case mentioned by the gentleman from Maryland, and therefore cannot be warranted by that precedent.

The gentleman has also stated that a committee was appointed by the last Congress to investigate the accounts of the officers of Government, merely upon common report. But it should be remembered that those officers were officers of the Executive Departments. It is the acknowledged duty of such officers—it is made their duty by law to give information to Congress, whenever required, upon any of their public transactions. And it is the peculiar right of the House of Representatives, as guardians of the Treasury, at any time, to inquire into the expenditures of public money. But are the judges of the United States placed in the same situation with the Executive officers? Are they to be under the same control, and equally dependent? You may indeed impeach the judges, if guilty of impeachable offence. But what other power over them is given you by the Constitution? It should further be remembered, that the resolution for appointing the investigating committee did not criminate any particular officer. At first it was proposed to examine only the accounts of the former Secretary of State. But upon its being suggested by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVSTIS,) who has been so strenuous an advocate for the present resolution, that it would be improper in that manner to attack the character of a particular officer, the resolution was made general, and extended to the accounts of all the Executive Departments.

Upon the like principle, the resolution now on the table is improper. My objection to it is, that it points out two particular officers as objects of suspicion, and proposes a committee for inquiring into their conduct without assigning any cause, and without specifying any subject of inquiry. Gentlemen have expressed a dissatisfaction that such a committee should be compared to the star chamber or the inquisition. If they do not perfectly resemble the star chamber, formerly known in England, or the inquisition of Spain, the proposed powers of the committee are certainly indefinite and inquisitorial. Perhaps, if a comparison was necessary, they might more properly be compared to the State inquisitors of Venice, who are well known to have formed one of the most detestable tyrannies ever tolerated in a country pretending to freedom.

If charges were specified in the resolution, a member of this House on moving it might then have a right to demand an inquiry. But are the House bound to investigate the conduct of a particular officer, without any charge against him? Gentlemen have said much about the general right of this House to inquire into the conduct of public officers, as if this were the point in dispute.

JANUARY, 1804.

Official Conduct of Judge Chase.

H. OF R.

But who has denied the right of inquiry as incident to the power of impeachment? When any officer is charged with an impeachable offence, it is admitted to be, and from the nature of the thing it might be, the right of the House to inquire into the truth of such charge. I trust no gentleman in opposition to the present resolution can be found so ignorant of the true principle on which it is opposed as to deny the responsibility of the public officers, or the right of the House to inquire into their conduct. But, the right being admitted, the question is made as to the exercise of that right in the manner now proposed. When this House is called upon to direct the whole force of its influence against a particular judge, is it not reasonable, is it not just, that some charge should first be stated against him? This is but a decent respect to judicial character. It is but a decent respect to the character which becomes the assembled Representatives of a nation. The person implicated might then be enabled to meet the inquiry and obviate unfounded suspicion. Our power with respect to the judges is the power of impeachment; but we are not, therefore, justified in wantonly assailing their characters and sporting with their sensibility to reputation. The right of inquiry relates to impeachable offences. Shall we, then, inquire where no offence is stated? So far is the resolution from stating what would warrant an impeachment, that it does not mention any offence, or refer to any transaction.

The gentleman from Virginia, who moved the resolution, (Mr. J. RANDOLPH,) has, indeed, declared his own conviction, that the judicial officer in question had done wrong. Might not other gentlemen also have their opinions and exercise their own judgments in forming them? They ask for the reasons of his conviction before they vote for his resolution. His information, he says, was received in such a manner that he does not choose to disclose it. If any person has communicated anything to him confidentially, he is not desired to name his informant. The gentleman shall not be desired by me to make any disclosure which would offend against the most delicate sense of honor. But can it be improper for him to state the general nature of the offence which he believes to have been committed? Will this violate any honorary confidence? He is desired to make such a statement that other members of the House may have an opportunity of judging whether the believed offence will warrant a vote of impeachment. In cases of this kind, is any member to be deemed infallible? When a gentleman, in his place, states a fact as of his own knowledge, his veracity is regarded as unquestionable; but his infallibility is not supposed to extend to matters of mere opinion. Upon the principle of its being possible for the gentleman from Virginia to err in opinion, and its being equally the right of the other members to judge what conduct amounts to an impeachable offence, it might have been reasonably thought that he would at least state to the House the nature of the facts on which he relies as the basis of his resolution. If he, or any other member, declaring his conviction that a judge has misdemeaned himself in office, will exhibit to the House a statement of any fact, or series of facts, which would warrant an impeachment, I will be ready instantly to vote for an inquiry. But nothing of this kind is exhibited, and therefore the resolution on the table is now opposed. Before you agree to oppress a judge with all that weight of suspicion which may be imposed by a vote of this House, let him be permitted to know what part of his conduct is supposed to be exceptionable, that opportunity may be had in the progress of any inquiry to vindicate himself against unmerited reproaches! Instead of a course of proceeding so fair and obviously just, the resolution on the table marks two of the judges for public suspicion, without specifying any supposed misconduct. It marks them as public objects of suspicion throughout the whole of their judicial life, and, without naming anything, invites private enemies to accuse them of everything.

To support such a resolution, common fame has been mentioned in the course of debate, as a sufficient ground of proceeding; and this idea is supposed to be authorized by English precedent. Whatever may have been done formerly, and in a period of rudeness or violence, the more improved system of modern jurisprudence should discard such a doctrine if it ever prevailed. But even that doctrine, if admitted, would not justify you in adopting the present resolution. You cannot thence infer the propriety of proceeding against a person who is not accused of anything punishable. Will it be pretended that the common fame, which is to be a ground of proceeding, does not refer to any offence or to any transaction? Common fame, if admitted for proof, must be supposed to apply to some subject of complaint. On the principle even of this very questionable doctrine, a statement of some charge is requisite. What, then, in the present case, is the accusation which could be supported by common fame? If there be any such, let it be stated.

The gentlemen who advocate the resolution in its present form fail in their efforts to support it, notwithstanding all the aid which they have sought from "the leading-strings and crutches of precedents," (to use the language of the gentleman from Virginia.) On general principles, on the broad basis of universal right, the resolution is condemned; and no precedent is adduced which can justify it. I do not wish to shield any public officers, whether judges or others, who may merit impeachment; but I wish the House, when acting as public accusers, to proceed in such a manner as not to do injury to any individual. Justice is due to the individual as well as to the public. No public duty can require this House to adopt a resolution of general reproach, yet stating no public offence. And it but illy accords with the principles of justice to subject the judicial officers of the Union to all the inconvenience, vexation, and expense, of being obliged to vindicate themselves against secret accusations, which it may be more difficult to discover than to overthrow.

You will observe, sir, that I do not enter into any particular examination of the case referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SMILIE,) whether there was a controversy as to prerogative and privilege between the court and the bar, in which the pride of professional rank appeared in opposition to judicial authority. Whether the judge very properly refused to yield to the counsel, or whether the court committed an error in pronouncing the law, these are topics which I think it needless to examine in considering the resolution now on the table; for the resolution itself states nothing, and there is no case before us for examination.

On so grave a subject as the present, when we are called upon to aid in the administration of justice, it was to be desired that the advocates of the resolution should so far regard their own exhortations as to refrain from attempting to enkindle the animosity of party. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMILIE) seems to have thought himself at liberty to pursue a different course. But, considering the nature of the question on which our votes are to be given, I hope to be excused if I deem it not proper in this debate to reply to him on the various topics of party discussion which he has chosen to mention, although the task might be easy indeed to repel his charges against the former Administration. A single observation, however, may be proper on a law to which he has alluded in the language of censure. There was at least one prominent feature which might recommend it to the friends of truth. It expressly declared that the truth might be given in evidence.

Mr. DENNIS observed that in the course of the remarks which he had the honor of making yesterday, he had declared himself in favor of the proposed investigation, provided it were made on proper principles; and, in order the more clearly to illustrate his ideas and evince his sincerity, he had read in his place a resolution embracing all the facts which had been suggested to the House as the foundation of this proceeding. He had then said he would not pledge himself to offer a resolution such as he then read, but would vote for it if offered by others. As the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had not accepted his overtures, and in the course of his observations had done him the honor of noticing some of his ideas expressed in yesterday's debate, he rose principally for the purpose of offering an amendment, and partly for the purpose of replying to one or two of the gentleman's remarks. He was not a little surprised at the animated strain in which that gentleman had addressed the House in the course of this morning, nor did anything appear to have fallen from any gentleman in the course of the discussion which appeared to him calculated to produce so much excitement as he had manifested. But as he did not claim to set up his own feelings or his own conduct as the standard by which the feelings or actions of others ought to be guided, and as the gentleman had applied his observations without implicating motives, he had not at all interrupted the equanimity of his disposition. He had exercised a right which he should always be disposed to accord to that gentleman and every other member—the right of placing the observations of his opponents in the most ludicrous point of view of which they were susceptible. In this right he would also indulge himself whenever the subject required it.

The gentleman from Virginia, in replying to some of his observations, had said that he had conceived the charge exhibited was of a very serious nature, but did not appear to comprehend in what respect he considered it so, and therefore he wished to explain in what manner he considered it as such. He considered it as serious, inasmuch as it was calculated to excite suspicion and asperse the official conduct of the gentlemen in question; but did not mean to insinuate, but on the contrary repelled the idea of its being serious as regarded its sufficiency, if true, as a foundation of impeachment. In order to show that the conduct of the judges had not been so highly censurable even as the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SMILIE,) or his colleague and the gentleman from Virginia, seemed to suppose, he begged leave to state his ideas as to the rectitude of their conduct. Here he might use the observation of the gentleman from Virginia, applied to one of his own remarks, and say, that gentleman had with no great dexterity confounded two principles as distant from each other as the northern from the southern pole. He seemed to assimilate the case in which the court have arbitrarily withdrawn the question of law entirely from the jury, to the conduct of the court in this case, which only went to restrict the counsel from arguing before the jury a case already settled in the minds of the court, by a train of judicial determinations in similar cases, and in which they left both law and fact to the determination of the jury; directing them as to the law upon the subject. He was warranted in his opinion, because the gentleman from Virginia, in illustrating some of his positions, had cited the case of libel as decided by Lord Mansfield, and Mr. Fox's celebrated declaratory bill, which grew out of that decision. What analogy has that case to the case in question? Lord Mansfield decided that in the case of a libel, all the jury had to do was to find the fact of publication or not, and that whether when published it were criminal or not, they had no right to determine, and thus withdrew the question of law altogether from their decision.—This was justly regarded as a gross violation of that principle of the criminal law of that country, which invests the jury with the right to decide as well on the law as the fact. This principle I fully acknowledge, and if the court in the case of Fries had deprived the jury of that right, and withdrawn the question of law from them, there might be some foundation for this resolution. But, according to the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the question of law and fact were both submitted to the jury, with the instructions of the court on the legal question. He had always been taught to believe that the court were the proper organ through which the law was to be communicated to the jury, though he did not deny but the jury had the right which they should cautiously exercise, but which they would always exercise, when they discover an inclination in the court to oppress the citizen or exculpate the guilty, to reject the direction of the court and decide for themselves.

But the complaint is, that the court denied to the counsel the privilege of arguing the law before the jury. Mr. DENNIS said he believed the court possessed a power of this nature, to be regulated by a sound discretion. If the court should believe that a question had been put at rest by a long train of judicial decision, such as was the case in this instance, they not only have the right, but it becomes their duty to prevent a useless consumption of time, and to prohibit the counsel from agitating the question. Indeed it is indelicate in counsel to impress on the jury an opinion of law contrary to the known opinion of the court; nor is there any court who will not take on themselves the right of checking counsel, in an attempt to mislead the jury on a question of law. Such was the practice of the courts in Maryland, and in that country from which we derive all our notions of jurisprudence.

But though he did not conceive that there was any ground for impeachment in the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, yet he knew that this discussion would produce a vague and undefined censure, which he believed the judges in question ought to have an opportunity of repelling. He therefore moved the following amendment, by way of preamble to the resolution:

Whereas information has been given to the House by one of its members, that, in a certain prosecution for treason on the part of the United States against a certain John Fries, pending in the circuit court of the United States in the State of Pennsylvania, Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and Richard Peters, district judge for the district of Pennsylvania, by whom the said circuit court was then holden, did inform the counsel for the prisoner, that as the court had formed their opinion upon the point of law, and would direct the jury thereupon, the counsel for the prisoner must confine their argument before the jury to the question of fact only; and whereas it is represented, that in consequence of such determination of the court, the counsel did refuse to address the jury on the question of fact, and the said John Fries was found guilty of treason and sentenced by the court to the punishment in such case by the laws of the United States provided, and was pardoned by the President of the United States:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to investigate the truth of the said allegations, and to report a statement of facts in the case aforesaid, with their opinion thereupon, whether the said Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, or either of them, have so conducted themselves on the trial aforesaid as to render necessary the interposition of the Constitutional powers of this House.

This amendment embraces all the facts stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, points out a specific charge as the foundation of the proceeding, and yet, when attached to the resolution, gives to the committee the power of general inquiry.

We are told that the facts have been stated by a member on the floor, and there is no reason for stating them in the resolution. Will the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania appear on your journals, and how will it hereafter be known that any fact was stated as the foundation on which to erect a committee with general inquisitorial powers? Posterity will only see the resolution, and to them it will be a precedent which will justify the creation of a committee of inquiry into the official conduct of any officer, without the allegation of a single fact, whenever a member may choose to be of opinion that a vexatious and expensive proceeding shall be instituted. It was therefore that he wished to resist the principle, and for that purpose moved the amendment.

Mr. HUGER said he had before stated, and he now repeated, that he was not averse to an investigation; but he did not consider himself bound to vote for a resolution so general and vague. If the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland were adopted he should vote for the resolution.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the whole of it after the word "whereas," and by inserting—

"Members of this House have stated in their places that they have heard certain acts of official misconduct alleged against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and Richard Peters, judge of the district court of the district of Pennsylvania"

Mr. HUGER had no objection to the insertion of the last amendment, but he had to striking out the first. He therefore called for the yeas and nays upon striking out.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays upon striking out, and carried—yeas 79, nays 41, as follows:

The question was now taken on inserting the amendment of Mr. NICHOLSON, and carried.

The question was then put upon agreeing to the amendment thus amended.

Mr. PURVIANCE said he could not vote for it because it did not state the fact. It declared that members of the House had stated that they had heard of official acts of misconduct of both the judges, when but one act had been charged against Judge Peters.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH observed that he perceived no reason for the preamble. He hoped therefore it would not be agreed to. General inquiry was his object, and, as going to limit it, he was against the preamble.

Mr. ELLIOT said that, had the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland prevailed, he might have reconciled it to his mind to vote for the resolution thus amended. But as it stood, he could not.

Mr. NICHOLSON remarked that when he offered the amendment, the incorrectness suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina had not occurred to him. To obviate this incorrectness he would move to amend the amendment by saying "a certain act of Richard Peters."

The SPEAKER said this amendment was not in order.

Mr. NICHOLSON said that under such circumstances he must vote against the whole amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment as amended was lost without a division.

TUESDAY, January 17.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the captors of the Moorish armed ships Meshouda and Mirboha," with an amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

STATE BALANCES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the motion of Mr. RODNEY, to extinguish the State balances.

MR. RODNEY.—I hope the Committee will agree to the resolution as modified, and to the extinguishment of the balances reported against the several States. It is true, as has been remarked, when the subject was before the House sometime since, that it has been repeatedly under discussion, and that by this time it is probably perfectly understood and familiar to every member. It is true that it has heretofore undergone an investigation, more able, perhaps, than I am able to give it; I believe, however, every time it has been discussed, its friends have increased in number. I flatter myself, therefore, there can be no objection to inquiry into its merits at this period, because I believe that those who have heretofore voted one way, have sufficient magnanimity, if it shall be made clearly to appear that these balances ought to be extinguished, to think for themselves, without regard to any previous opinions they may have imbibed. It is honorable to any person to alter his opinion whenever he is convinced of his error. Besides, there are a great number of new members in this House who will not be disposed to pin their faith on the sleeves of their predecessors. It is well known the State I have the honor to represent is more affected by the heavy balance against her hanging over her head, than any State in the Union. It will be recollected, agreeably to the report of the Commissioners who settled the accounts between the United States and the respective States, that $612,000 were reported to be due by her; this with interest from the year 1793. amounts to about $1,000,000. This is a very serious subject to the State of Delaware; one which she severely feels; which depreciates the price of her land and paralyzes the industry of her citizens. I beg leave to say it is not my object to touch the settlement of the Commissioners, so far as it regards the creditor States; like the ark of the covenant, I deem it too sacred to be touched by impure hands. I am likewise far from imputing to them any improper or unjust motives whatever. Whilst I subscribe to this doctrine, and that the creditor States receive the balances reported in their favor, permit me to take a retrospective view of the business, to show, so far as can be proved from the nature of the case, that there may have been, nay, must have been, some important mistake in the settlement, the Commissioners having no standard to resort to, by which to determine with mathematical or arithmetical certainty what was due by the States. If the Committee shall be of opinion that some mistake may have occurred, when they consider that so far as relates to the claims of the creditor States, they have been provided for, I trust they will view with indulgence the claims now made by the debtor States.

When in consequence of the acts of a flagitious Ministry, who attempted to forge chains for our free country, America rose as one man to assert her rights and destroy the tyranny of that Government which wished to enslave her, she was understood as one nation engaged in a common cause; certain articles of Union were proposed, one of which stipulated that the proportion in which each State should contribute to the general defence, should be according to the value of lands in the respective States. It will be recollected that the Articles of Confederation were not agreed to until the war had nearly terminated, and that this ratio was not uniformly acted upon by Congress as the basis on which requisitions were made. It was not relied on in all cases and on all occasions; if it had been agreed upon, Congress would have still been at a loss how to proceed. Every apportionment must therefore have necessarily been arbitrary. In this embarrassing situation, with a view to relieve themselves from the difficulties which surrounded them, Congress, in the month of April, in the year 1783, recommended to the several States the adoption of that rule of apportionment which is to be found in the Federal Constitution. This rule, however, was not adopted by the States, until it was incorporated in that instrument. I mention these facts to show that there was no permanent, universal, and unerring foundation on which the ratio of taxation rested. If each member of the Board of Commissioners, had possessed the fiscal talents and financial knowledge of the present Secretary of the Treasury, and instead of the comparatively short time they were occupied in the settlement, had consumed a series of years, it is scarcely within the confines of possibility, and much less of probability, that they should have attained in every case substantial justice. It will be recollected what was the nature and extent of the accounts which they had to adjust. Rudis indigesta que moles. They were not accounts kept with the regularity of those of a merchant's counting-house, they were not confined to the transactions of a single voyage, nor to the business of one company, but comprehended the complicated transactions of independent States, the multiplied and intricate accounts of entire sovereignties, and those too, not in time of peace, but during the stormy period of a Revolution, in which we were contending against one of the most powerful nations in Europe for our liberties and independence. I believe them to have done the best they could, and to have attempted faithfully to bring about a settlement so important to be effected, and which Congress, as early as 1787, attempted to make. Congress in that year passed a resolution by which the States were districted, and Commissioners appointed to go through the several States to receive accounts; but all those accounts were warranted by acts of Congress themselves; at the same time they constituted a Board to audit accounts for particular defence, and such as were not authorized by the resolutions of Congress, considering what a State did for herself she did for the Union.

Thus the business rested when the Federal Constitution was brought about; that Constitution the State of Delaware had the honor first to adopt, and was, I believe, the only State whose Legislature adopted it unanimously. When Congress met under the Constitution, the general principle on which the settlement of the accounts of the several States should take place was not much disputed. No man pretended to say, when South Carolina was overrun with internal foes and subject to civil war, the United States were not benefited in proportion to the efforts she made to crush those enemies; everything she did was for the general good, and every man acquiesced in the justness of the principle, that she should bring forward her accounts for particular as well as general defence, and it was seen that the United States would fall in debt from this circumstance to every State in the Union: every State had to contend with the external enemy, or with the internal foe in the shape of insurrections.

It may be proper at this place, to advert to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which laid the foundation for the assumption of the State debts. I am not about to inquire into the policy of the measure, or whether it was best to be effected in this way, in that, or the other; I take it as I find it; when examined, it will be found that the then Secretary thought the ratio or rule of apportionment adopted by the Commissioners under the act of Congress, passed in the year 1790, would not be the correct one, as will appear from the report and supposititious statement made by him of the relative situation of the different States, as debtor, and creditor. Delaware, so far from being considered at that time as a debtor State, was contemplated in the light of a creditor State, and in proportion to her ability more so than any in the Union. I will read a passage or two from the report, and advert to the statement. The Secretary, after concluding that a discrimination ought not to be made between original holders and subsequent purchasers, proceeds to examine "whether a difference ought to be permitted, to remain between them and another description of public creditors—those of the States individually.

"The Secretary, after mature reflection on this point, entertains a full conviction that an assumption of the debts of the particular States by the Union, and a like provision for them as for those of the Union, will be a measure of sound policy and substantial justice.

"It would, in the opinion of the Secretary, contribute in an eminent degree to an orderly, stable, and satisfactory arrangement of the national finances.

"Admitting, as ought to be the case, that a provision must be made in some way or other, for the entire debt, it will follow that no greater revenues will be required, whether that provision be made wholly by the United States, or partly by them, and partly by the States separately.

"There is an objection, however, to an assumption of the State debts, which deserves particular notice. It may be supposed that it would increase the difficulty of an equitable settlement between them and the United States.

"The principles of that settlement, whenever they shall be discussed, will require all the moderation and wisdom of the Government. In the opinion of the Secretary, that discussion, till further lights are obtained, would be premature.

"All, therefore, which he would now think advisable on the point in question, would be, that the amount of the debts assumed and provided for, should be charged to the respective States, to abide an eventual arrangement. This the United States, as assignees to the creditors, should have an indisputable right to do.

"But as it might be a satisfaction to the House to have before them some plan for the liquidation of accounts between the Union and its members, which, including the assumption of the State debts, would consist with equity, the Secretary will submit in this place such thoughts on the subject as have occurred to his own mind, or been suggested to him, most compatible, in his judgment, with the end proposed.

"Let each State be charged with all the money advanced to it out of the Treasury of the United States, liquidated according to the specie value at the time of such advance, with interest at six per cent.

"Let it also be charged with the amount, in specie value, of all its securities which shall be assumed, with the interest upon them, to the time when interest shall become payable by the United States.

"Let it be credited for all moneys paid and articles furnished to the United States, and for all other expenditures during the war, either towards general or particular defence, whether authorized or unauthorized by the United States; the whole liquidated to specie value, and bearing an interest of six per cent. from the several times at which the several payments, advances, and expenditures accrued.

"And let all sums of Continental money now in the treasuries of the respective States, which shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, be credited at specie value.

"Upon a statement of the accounts according to these principles, there can be little doubt that balances would appear in favor of all the States, against the United States.

"To equalise the contributions of the States, let each be then charged with its proportion of the aggregate of those balances, according to some equitable ratio, to be devised for that purpose.

"If the contributions should be found disproportionate, the result of this adjustment would be, that some States would be creditors, some debtors to the Union.

"This plan seems to be susceptible of no objection, which does not belong to every other, that proceeds on the idea of a final adjustment of accounts. The difficulty of settling a ratio is common to all. This must, probably, either be sought for in the proportions of the requisitions, during the war, or in the decision of the Commissioners, appointed with plenary power. The rule prescribed in the Constitution, with regard to representation and direct taxes, would evidently not be applicable to the situation of parties, during the period in question."

He then makes a supposititious statement, by which it appears that Delaware was considered as having a demand against the United States of about $10,000. [Here Mr. Rodney particularly adverted to the statement below.]

It may abundantly appear to the minds of gentlemen that in this business it was impossible, from the nature of the case, for the Commissioners to ascertain with mathematical certainty the balances due to or from any one State to the United States. If considered in this point of view, I hope gentlemen will be not over anxious in pressing the debtor States for every shilling alleged to be due by them, when the creditor States have had their demands fully satisfied.

When we advert to the particular case of the State I have the honor of representing, we shall find abundant reason why her balance should be extinguished. The State of Delaware does not stand in need of any eulogium from me, and, if she did, I am not accustomed to the language of panegyric; but I may say, that in proportion to her resources, her efforts in the Revolutionary cause were second to no State in the Union. When we find in the report that the State of Delaware was not heard before the Commissioners, though she requested a hearing, gentlemen may account for the extraordinary result of a settlement so far as related to her. She was told, it was true, she might have a hearing, but she was informed at the same time that the case on which she desired to be heard was already decided; this will appear from an official document laid before the Senate of that State.

"The late Commissioner for stating and supporting the claims of this State against the United States, in obedience to the order of the honorable the General Assembly of the 17th instant, makes the following report:

"Having in his report to the General Assembly at October sessions, 1791, exhibited a general statement, he now transmits the particular accounts, as far as they are in his possession, from whence the said statement was drawn.

"The accounts exhibited to the district Commissioners, marked No. 1, in general statement, are contained in a book lodged in the office of the Board of Commissioners, which book ought now to be returned to this State. These included all charges for general defence, depreciating certificates, recruiting accounts, supplies to the army, and every other expense which could be supported against the Union under the ordinance of May 7, 1787.

“The accounts in the second line, marked No. 2., are for general and particular defence; containing expenditures by the State, not warranted by resolutions of Congress, and therefore inadmissible under the ordinance of May 7, 1787. This is accompanied by a sheet marked No. 2, and an account of particulars answering to No. 19, in the said sheet.

“The accounts in the third line, marked No. 3, being for payments on warrants and requisitions of Congress, was drawn from the books of the State, in the Auditor’s office, and needs no explanation.

“The late Commissioner reports what he mentioned in his former report, that he never had an opportunity given him to advocate the claims of Delaware, after their first delivery. He applied to the Commissioners several times, both personally and by letter, to know when he should attend for that purpose. The answer was, that notice should be given him; and the notice was, that his further attendance was unnecessary, as the Commissioners had already determined on the accounts of Delaware.

“All which is respectfully submitted.

“ELEAZER M’COMB.

I do not mean to impute improper motives to the Commissioners, but merely to state a fact proved by the highest authority. The simple, plain, and stubborn fact is, that in this settlement Delaware was not heard; and I call on gentlemen to bring the case home to their own business and bosoms. Suppose they were individually condemned to pay sums to an enormous extent without being heard, would they consider it fair or just? It is a maxim of eternal and immutable justice to hear both sides before a decision is made, and I have heard it observed by a celebrated character, that he was an unrighteous judge who decided without hearing both parties, even where he decided correctly; because he acted against the first maxim of justice, and because his decision, though right, was the effect of accident. If this statement be correct, will not gentlemen advert to the fact and suffer it to make a proper impression on their minds? It appears, from the account of Mr. McComb, that $3,261,044 was furnished by Delaware in paper money, and $380,228 in specie. Much of the first description of money was paid before it had undergone any considerable depreciation by the scale established in that State. Owing to fortuitous circumstances the paper medium was better, and the State had to pay more, of consequence, than any other State in the Union. By the laws of Delaware it will also appear that Congress no sooner made a requisition than the Legislature of that State passed an act to comply with it—no sooner was the call made than the people were compelled to pay their taxes to meet it. Every requisition Congress made till the year 1787, was promptly complied with, and on some occasions we raised more than sixty thousand dollars a year to enable us to comply with the requisitions of the United States; and it will be found from the report of the Auditor of the State, (Thomas Montgomery,) a man every way qualified for that situation, for the year 1794, that, prior to the year 1784, there was not a single tax levied that was not paid, nor a single county behindhand a single dollar. Afterwards there was a small balance remaining unpaid by the county of Sussex, a smaller from the county of Kent, and a still smaller perhaps from the county of Newcastle. I mention these circumstances to show that more must have been paid by that State than is allowed in the settlement, for all this money was certainly levied and collected from the pockets of the people of that State; and to prove that the account rendered by our Commissioner (Mr. McComb) against the United States, was accurate and just. An account supported by such plain, unequivocal testimony as the solemn acts of our Legislature, and the report of that officer to whom the State confided the superintendence of her finances, for sums of such magnitude, in specie as well as in paper currency, ought to make a favorable impression on the members of this Committee. It proves most manifestly that our State contributed the sum of — in Continental money and — in gold or silver coin towards the exigencies of the war, besides the services of her soldiers, than whom none were braver, especially those who composed her intrepid regiment. One charge of the United States against the several States referred to a certain species of certificates, known by the name of depreciation certificates, given to the officers and soldiers in consequence of the depreciation of their pay. At this moment there lie in her chest sixty or eighty thousand dollars of these certificates, and, if she had been disposed to act unfairly, she might at the proper time have loaned them, and that amount might have gone into the coffers of the State, but she would not descend to this act, she was disposed to do as she would be done by, and I trust this will be considered as a meritorious act on her part.

In some laws found in our volume, particularly in a law of 1787, it will be found that the State of Delaware was compelled to pay requisitions whose proportion was greater than they ought to have been according to any known federal rule. Still, even when she considered the imposition made upon her more than it ought to be, when her representatives in the Legislature in the act of 1787 declared, "that her proportion was greater than it ought to be on any known or acknowledged principle of federal taxation," she cheerfully acquiesced and paid the money required from her. It has been, I believe, on a former occasion when this subject was before the House, ably and eloquently observed by my friend from Virginia (Mr. J. RANDOLPH) that if the State of Delaware had been asleep during the whole Revolutionary conflict, and had not contributed a cent or soldier to the common cause, the balance charged against her could not amount to the enormous sum of one million of dollars. When, on the contrary, we take into consideration the great sums which she actually paid, and the gallant soldiers furnished in her regiment and from her militia, ought not gentlemen to listen to the reasons now urged, and ought they not to have great weight on the minds of liberal and candid men? As I said before, I do not mean to impeach the original settlement; but if such an inexplicable result has occurred in the case of Delaware, what may not have occurred in the settlement of the accounts of the other States? With their cases I am unacquainted. I will not, therefore, trespass on the patience of the Committee further on this score, but considering the subject in this favorable point of right as to Delaware, I will advance to the strongest ground which presents itself.

How are the United States by any competent authority to obtain payment of these balances? Are they to put any State to the ban of the empire? Are they to make war upon any State by means of an army on land or a navy at sea? This is a position for which, I presume, no gentleman will contend. Are they to fund the balances due in the proportion of the creditor States? If it is the wish of gentlemen to add to our debt millions, I know not how many, the object may, perhaps, be accomplished in this way; but such a measure, I presume will not be adopted. Will gentlemen then preserve this bone of contention with the States? For a bone it literally is; it contains not an atom of nutrition to the United States. Will they preserve it when it will not bring one shilling into their pockets? will they keep alive this coal which may hereafter be fanned into a flame, and which may, at some future day, become a subject of compromise, not to say bargain, and may be made an instrument of much greater injury even to the creditor States than the nominal balances can possibly be of benefit to them? Remember that two of the principal debtor States are, from their wealth and numbers, among the most respectable in the Union. If you will keep these balances suspended over them, what may not be apprehended? If the subject be considered in this point of view, it will appear that it is for the interest of the whole United States that these balances should be done away. It is for the interest of the creditor States that no subject of dispute may remain—that the hatchet may be buried. Their balances are already funded; and if the debtor balances be extinguished, these will be considered as sacred. And need I say that it is for the interest of the debtor States? They, year after year, have called for the extinguishment.

JANUARY, 1804.

State Balances.

H. OF R.

With regard to the State of Delaware, the continuance of these balances is of the most serious injury to her. I know an honorable Senator from Maryland, who owns lands on both sides of the line which separates Delaware from Maryland, who cannot get as much by one-third for his land in Delaware, as for that within the borders of Maryland, although the land in Maryland is part of the same tract, and of precisely the same quality as that in Delaware. Is not this of some importance to the State of Delaware? is it not enough to distress, and essentially to check, the progress of her citizens in every laudable pursuit? must it not necessarily tend essentially to retard the improvement of her land, to depress trade and to paralyze industry, and all this without one scintilla of use to the United States or to any State in the Union? I hope the Committee, considering the subject in this view, will agree to the resolution, impressed with the opinion that it would be equally for the welfare of the United States, for those States which are debtor, and for those which are creditor, to adopt it.

Mr. ELMER.—I agree in opinion with the gentleman from Delaware, who introduced the resolution on your table, that it involves in it an important and interesting question. And I am, with him, fully persuaded that every member of this Committee will weigh the consequence of it with that seriousness and candor which it demands, and decide upon it, after the most mature deliberation, according to his sense of justice and propriety, notwithstanding any prejudices or preconceived opinions which he may have formed. But I can by no means agree in sentiment with him, that some mistake must have taken place in the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States, nor that any such mistake ought to be presumed of so serious a nature as to induce the Supreme Legislature of the land to extinguish the balances found due from the debtor States, by the strong arm of sovereign authority.

Upon what foundation, sir, does this resolution rest? What are the facts or reasons which have or can be adduced to prove the settlement erroneous in point of principle or equity, or to justify Congress to abolish an important part of it? The gentleman alleges, that in apportioning the expenses of the Revolution, which proved so glorious, and happily relieved us from the tyranny of a foreign Power, among the several States, the Commissioners deviated from the rule prescribed by the Articles of Confederation, upon which the requisitions of the old Congress were founded, in a point which materially affected some of the debtor States. But it should be observed, that this line of conduct was authorized by the laws of the United States, in conformity with the Constitution, and upon the most correct principles that could be established. No other method could have produced a settlement at all. And, further, it was well calculated to insure an equitable settlement—at least, a more equitable one than could be obtained in any other way. Several of the States which were found debtor were then increasing rapidly in wealth and population, and are still increasing, far beyond the creditor States, or any former calculations. Can it then be pretended, with the least color of propriety, that, under these circumstances, it was either unfair or unequitable to apportion the expenses of the Revolution according to the enumeration of the inhabitants of each State? In my judgment, the measure was correct and legitimate.

In order to show that the State of Delaware could not be justly charged with all the balance found against her, the gentleman has produced a supposititious statement, made by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report to Congress, on the subject of funding the State debts. This statement however was, as far as appears, wholly supposititious, not bottomed on a single data, and very probably introduced into the report with no other view than to induce Congress to pursue those measures with relation to the public debt which he was then intent upon. It cannot with any shadow of reason be brought in competition, or in the least degree to invalidate a settlement made by men specially appointed for that purpose, acting under the solemnity of an oath, and who spent much time and pains to make a correct and equitable adjustment of all the accounts.

The honorable gentleman has further urged, as an objection to the settlement, that the agent for the State of Delaware complained, at the time, of the conduct of the Commissioners in refusing to hear him in support of the claims which he exhibited. But this, like most other objections, will vanish in empty air when fairly examined. I always understood that none of the State agents were heard any further than to explain or elucidate their accounts. The agent for New Jersey, I, know, was as fully debarred of a hearing before the Commissioners as the agent of Delaware. It is perfectly clear to me, that it would have been highly improper to have heard the agents; and I very much doubt whether all the eloquence of the honorable gentleman, aided by all the learned councils of the nation, would have altered the opinion of the Commissioners, or produced a different result. Besides, it has not been shown that any of his accounts were rejected; and, if not, it would have been perfectly idle to have spent time in advocating them. No partialities for or against particular States have been made to appear against the Commissioners, and none can, with any propriety, be imputed to them. The settlement, therefore, has the appearance of being as correct as the nature of the business and other circumstances rendered practicable, and ought to be maintained by the nation.

Mr. Chairman, could I be impressed with the propriety and justice of the measure, and could

I be persuaded that it would tend to strengthen the bands of the Union and promote the peace and harmony of the States, I would, with as much cordiality as any gentleman of the Committee, give my assent to the resolution on your table. But, sir, there are several objections which operate forcibly on my mind against it. I fear it would tend to destroy, or at least greatly to weaken, the principle of distributive justice, which is the band of our union, and which we are most solemnly bound to maintain and support with scrupulous exactness. The public debt, as has been well observed, arose out of the exigencies of the Revolution—it is the price of our glorious emancipation—and the balances resulted from the equalization of that debt among the parties benefitted.

When pressing emergencies compelled Congress to call upon any State to furnish supplies or troops beyond her estimated quota, she always accompanied the request with assurances that she would be remunerated upon the final adjustment of the accounts. In consequence of this, great and efficient aid was frequently afforded to the common cause, which could not otherwise have been expected or obtained. When peace arrived, Congress did not lose sight of her promises, but, in 1787, constituted a Board of Commissioners for the apportionment and liquidation of all the debts incurred during the war, and clothed them with ample powers to distribute the most complete justice that was attainable; and the States were called upon to exhibit their respective accounts. After the adoption of the present Constitution, a law was passed confirming the ordinance of the old Congress, and prescribing the mode that was to be observed in the liquidation of the accounts. This solemn transaction, so long in maturing, could never have been intended as a mere mockery of the parties concerned. It was predicated upon Federal principles, and was designed to obtain substantial justice. Thus instituted and appointed, the Commissioners proceeded, with great care and laborious investigation, to the liquidation of the accounts; and, after great length of time, struck the balances with as much justice as could possibly be attained. Some inequality of a partial nature might probably have taken place, yet none of a very serious nature can fairly be supposed. And shall we now, when the documents are destroyed, or placed without our reach, and without any evidence of incapacity or corruption in the Commissioners, proceed to disannul their proceedings by extinguishing the balances which they reported? I trust not. Justice and propriety, in my mind, forbid the measure.

Further, Mr. Chairman, the resolution on your table is objectionable inasmuch as it would exhibit to the nation and to the world an instance of inconstancy in our Councils, and thereby weaken the confidence of individuals and of the respective States in the wisdom and stability of the General Government. It has on its front an anti-federal aspect, and in every point of view exhibits an incorrect principle of legislation, and extreme impropriety.

The gentleman from Delaware has endeavored in a variety of ways, and with great ingenuity, to impress the Committee with a belief that the State which he represents was relatively hard dealt by in the settlement, and, therefore, in reason and justice, she is not bound to pay the balance due from her. But all his labor on this head will have but little weight. We shall probably hear the same tale from the members of the creditor as well as the debtor States, and the dispute on this subject would be futile and endless. I believe I could make some gentlemen of this Committee believe that New Jersey suffered as much injustice, if not more, in the liquidation of the accounts than Delaware. In fact, sir, there are very strong reasons for suspecting that a State which was for almost the whole period of the war the theatre of hostile manœuvres, and frequently occupied by large contending armies, must have had accounts to a very large amount for military services, and supplies for our army in distressing times, in such an irregular and unsupported form as to be excluded upon the principles adopted for their adjustment. And whatever credit may be due to other States, and much merit is attached to all of them, I must contend that in zeal, activity, and energy, New Jersey was second to none. But I shall not dwell on this topic. Every observation of this kind is totally irrelative to the present subject. I rely upon the correctness of the settlement, which, I repeat, ought to be presumed, as it was made with great deliberation, under the solemn authority of the General Government, and in part at least ratified and confirmed by subsequent acts.

After occupying ultimately a variety of less eligible stations, the gentleman took his stand upon what he styles strong ground, beyond the reach of every assault. He asks how the debtor States are to be compelled to pay? Will the United States employ physical force, and lay them under contributions at the point of the bayonet, with fleets and armies? No, this is not contemplated by any gentleman. We should all start at the proposition. But the gentleman himself has suggested a method of obtaining these balances, which, although I do not know that it is contemplated by any person, is certainly by no means repugnant to the principles of our Government; and that is, to fund a sum equal to the balance due to the debtor in favor of the creditor States, in a ratio proportionate to their respective credits. We, however, do not call upon them for payment in any way. We are content to let the matter rest in the present situation of business—and why should not the debtor be content? But it is asked why keep up this bone of contention, which does not contain an atom of nourishment? Why keep alive a spark which may be blown up into a desolating flame? But may we not ask, in our turn, from whence does this contention proceed; and what reason can be given for relinquishing a claim so well sanctioned? It would illy comport with that magnanimity and heroic patriotism which the whole Union has exhibited to the view of an admiring world, for the debtor States to refuse payment on a proper occasion. I cannot entertain the idea. The State of New York has already expended a considerable sum on the terms held out to her by law, and she has ample resources for doing more, honorable to herself, and advantageous to the public.

If the whole sum should prove hard and oppressive upon the some of the debtor States, let it be lightened, and the mode of payment made easy and convenient to them. I am far from wishing that any State should ever pay anything that would prove burdensome and oppressive upon her citizens. But stability and consistency forbid us to stretch forth the arm of sovereignty and with one dash blot out a debt ascertained with so much care and founded on principles so correct and truly federal. The measure might be attended with evil consequences which the most sagacious do not apprehend, and which the wisest may not hereafter be able to prevent.

Mr. Chairman, this subject has been so often discussed, and is so well understood by the nation and by the members of the House, that it is not probable any arguments which can be adduced will change the sentiments of any one. I shall, therefore, conclude with expressing my firm persuasion that the resolution on your table ought not, and my confidence is that it will not pass.

Mr. THATCHER was decidedly opposed to the extinguishment of these balances due from the debtor States; and as the State which he had the honor to represent was deeply interested in this question, he should attempt a reply to what had been advanced in support of this resolution, and should briefly state his reasons for voting in the negative.

These balances, said Mr. T., were found due upon a settlement of the demands of the respective States for services and supplies during our Revolutionary war. Although Congress, no doubt, equalised the burden as much as possible, during the Revolution, it was found, at the close of the war, that the States had contributed to the common defence in very unequal proportions. It was well known that the New England States, in particular, had furnished more than their respective quotas of men and money. From a sense of this inequality, Congress submitted the debts due from and to the several States, to a Board of Commissioners who, for several years, investigated the subject with the most minute and laborious attention. During this time each State had an opportunity to present and to substantiate its claims; and the report of the Commissioners has been repeatedly sanctioned by Congress. Although, as the gentleman from Delaware has said, the State which he represents was not heard before the Commissioners by its special agents, this was the case of all the States.

It is impossible, said Mr. T., as the gentleman from New Jersey has observed, to examine the ground upon which this report was formed. From the loss of documents, the lapse of time, and the vast extent of the subject, this is certainly impracticable. It is not even proposed by the mover of the resolution. The gentleman from Delaware has not arraigned the motives of the Commissioners, but he conceives that, upon a just settlement, the State he represents could not have been found so much in arrears; although he calls upon us to expunge the sums reported against the debtor States, he is willing that those reported to be due to the creditor States should be paid. Sir, said Mr. T., I conceive that the debts and credits must stand upon precisely the same ground. They both resulted from one settlement, and it is impossible to separate them. Upon what ground can we pay the creditor States, if we admit that nothing is due from the debtor? He conceived that expunging these balances, as contemplated by the resolution, upon the ground of a partial or unjust settlement, would most clearly imply that the sums awarded to the creditor States are not due. This, of itself, would render it unjust and impolitic to extinguish the balances due from the debtor States.

Another argument in favor of the resolution is, that the debtor States cannot be compelled to pay these balances. If that be correct, where is the injury to the debtor States which has been exhibited in such lively colors? If the States cannot be compelled to pay these debts, how can they so materially reduce the value of real estates? How can they hang in terror over their heads? It is even said that it is dangerous to suffer these debts to remain. No evils have yet resulted to the United States, said Mr. T., from this source, nor could he perceive that any were to be apprehended. He knew there was in this House a majority of about thirty members, who represented debtor States, besides those from States formed out of debtor States; but he had too firm a reliance upon their sense of justice to suppose, that because gentlemen were the majority, they would vote themselves out of debt. Surely, said Mr. T., when gentlemen reflect that these sums are due for those exertions which achieved the Independence of America, they will acknowledge the justice of the claim. The State of New York (the largest debtor State) has already paid a part of its debt, under a law of Congress authorizing that State to apply the sums expended upon fortifications to the reduction of these balances. Shall we relinquish the claim because some of the States do not acknowledge the debt? The idea is inadmissible.

We are urged, sir, to adopt this resolution, because it is said Delaware can never pay her debt. Even if that be correct, it is no argument for expunging these balances. By adopting the resolution, we extinguish our claim, not only against that State, but against all the others. The conclusion will then be irresistible, that we question the accuracy and the fairness of the settlement, and the final consequence will probably be the extinguishment of the credits also.

This settlement cannot be disturbed upon any ground consistent with policy or good faith. It is the result of a reference voluntarily made by all parties concerned, and they are conclusively bound by the award.

Mr. THOMAS remarked, that as this subject had been so often before the public, so much had been said on it on former occasions, and he considered it so well understood, that he had determined not to have risen or said anything on it at this time, nor would he, had he not deemed it necessary to reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. THATCHER.) That gentleman has endeavored to impress the Committee with an opinion, that by extinguishing those balances we shall affect the credits of the creditor States; this said Mr. T. will not be the case; those States have received the whole of the balances reported in their favor, and extinguishing the balances reported against those called debtor, cannot possibly affect the credits of the creditor States; besides, if the credits of those States could have been affected by a measure of this kind, why did not the act of Congress passed in 1799 affect them? By the operations of that act, about one-half of the amount of those balances were extinguished had the States complied with the terms of it; and he would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, or any other gentleman on that floor, whether these credits, as they are called, were impaired by that act? He presumed no one would say that they were, nor can the measure contemplated in this resolution impair them in the least.

Mr. Chairman, said Mr. T., what possible good can result from a continuation of those claims? All agree that a payment of them cannot be coerced; and it cannot be expected that those States, believing the claims unjust, will pay those balances voluntarily; therefore, will your Treasury ever be a cent the richer by holding these claims over the heads of those States? Will it bring a cent into your Treasury? But, on the contrary, may not much evil result to the interests of this country by keeping up this bone of contention? Will it not have a powerful tendency to irritate the minds and disturb that cordial harmony so necessary to be preserved among the members of this Union? I trust the members of this Committee generally will see the folly of continuing the shadow of a claim over the heads of those States any longer, which can never be of any benefit, but which may be productive of much mischief, and will unite in expunging them from your records.

Mr. STANTON.—Mr. Chairman, the honorable member from Delaware, who introduced the resolution on your table for extinguishing the balances found due to the United States from the debtor States, says the aggregate amount is $3,517,582; the proportion of Delaware is about $600,000.

The honorable member from that State tells us, with his usual pathos, and great zeal, but without producing any proof, that the State he represents is much injured by the settlement made by the Commissioners for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States, that the citizens of Delaware have suffered a diminution in the value of their land, by having this enormous debt hanging over their heads; at the next moment, the honorable gentleman asserts, that there is no coercion in the General Government to oblige debtor States to pay the balances. If his position be correct, he may dismiss his fears, and so may his constituents, the people of Delaware. Mr.

Chairman, I ask where is the policy of this measure; can the Legislature relinquish these balances, and at a single stroke, as with a sponge, wipe them off, without violating the public faith deliberately and solemnly pledged? I hope they will not; respect to the former Government, as well as to ourselves, forbid the idea. But we are told, by the advocates of the resolution, that it never will be paid; if that is a sound doctrine, it goes to prove the inexpediency of passing the resolution. Mr. Chairman, this is turning the tables; whereas it has been the practice for ages, that the creditor call on the debtor, but in this instance the old order of things is reversed, and the debtor duns the creditor: this novel mode would suit my circumstances well, as I am largely in debt; but such a practice must not be indulged; in my opinion it is dangerous to society. Sir, I will refrain from bringing into view a comparison of the exertions of the States in the Revolutionary war, lest a comparison should wound the feelings of gentlemen. I am convinced that they all did their utmost, and the exertions of the State I have the honor to represent were inferior to none in the Union. I can assure the honorable mover of the resolution, that the citizens of Rhode Island have the most reason to complain of the settlement of any State in the Union; the reason is obvious, the law under which the Commissioners acted, was so framed as to exclude one-third of our debt, by a clause in the law, constituting the board, in these words—"Nor shall the claim of any citizen be admitted as a charge against the United States, in the account of any State, unless the same was allowed by such State, before the 24th September 1788." In consequence of this clause in the statute, three hundred thousand dollars, in the accounts of the State of Rhode Island against the United States, for services rendered, and supplies furnished during the Revolutionary war, was included. Two of the Commissioners gave me this information, and very much regretted that it was not in their power to do us equal justice with our sister States; they also remarked that the charges for similar services rendered, were five per cent. on an average lower than charges made by the Southern States. Sir, if it were practical to obtain a revision of the settlement, I would, in behalf of the State of Rhode Island, cheerfully embrace it, under a full persuasion of extricating that State I have the honor of representing from the severe burden of taxation they are now struggling under. Taking it for granted that a reconsideration cannot be effected, I hope the resolution will be rejected. Sir, if it should be asked how it came to pass that our debt was so large, I would answer, in consequence of the British fleet and army taking possession of Newport, and all the valuable land of Narraganset Bay, also Block Island, and remaining three years in the bowels of the State, annihilating our commerce, burning our towns, plundering our inhabitants, dragging them into prisons, and stripping the shores of their stock. Sir, I will not longer trespass on the indulgence of the House, but content myself by giving my hearty negative to the resolution.

State Balances.

H. OF R.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE.—Mr. Chairman, I had determined not to trouble the Committee with any remarks upon the subject now under discussion, from a conviction that enough had already been said by the gentleman from Delaware to satisfy every liberal mind of the propriety of adopting the resolution. But, sir, when I hear the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. THATCHER) applying epithets to those States that are reported debtors, calculated to stamp them with the character of profligate dishonesty, while others in an indirect way appear to be aiming at the same end, I feel it a duty I owe the State which I have the honor to represent in part, to assign the reasons why she has heretofore refused, and I am convinced will ever continue to refuse paying the balance reported against her. Every gentleman who has as yet spoken against the resolution, has endeavored to impress upon the Committee a belief that the settlement made by the Commissioners was either just, or at least as nearly so as was possible. But, sir, on this subject I must beg leave to differ in opinion with them; and if I can be favored with the attention of the Committee, I trust I shall be able to show clearly that by the operation of some of the principles by which the Commissioners were governed in this settlement, the State of North Carolina was in the first place charged with a much larger proportion of the national debt than she ought to have been, and in the next place, that her charges against the Union, or at least a large portion of them, were improperly valued at a much lower rate than they should have been, and from hence it has happened that she was reported a debtor instead of being made a creditor to a very considerable amount.

The first injury sustained by the State of North Carolina in this settlement, which I shall notice, is the one which arose from changing the ratio by which the several States were bound to each other to bear all the expenses of the war. That the Committee may the more clearly comprehend the force of her exception against this measure, I must beg them to bear in mind that every item in the accounts which were settled by the Commissioners were for advances which had been made by the several States, towards defraying the expenses of the war, previous to the 24th day of September, 1788; while the States were bound by the Articles of Confederation, and each was suffering all the disadvantages, and enjoying all the advantages arising from that instrument; and that the ordinance by which the Board of Commissioners was established for settling these accounts, was passed by the old Congress on the 7th of May, 1787. They will thus see that the whole of the charges originated, and that the Board of Commissioners was established for settling them previous to the adoption of the present Constitution; and from hence I think they will be induced to conclude with me, that Congress had not a right to vary the ratio as they did by their act of the 5th of August, 1790, without first obtaining the consent of the several States to the measure, in the manner pointed out by the Articles of Confederation.

By the eighth article of the Confederation the States stipulate to bear all expenses of war, each in proportion to all its appropriated lands and improvements, but reserve to their respective Legislatures the power of laying and levying the taxes necessary to pay off their quotas; and by the thirteenth article of that instrument, they provide that no alteration shall at any time be made in the Articles of Confederation, or any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the Legislatures of every State. Yet, sir, after the Commissioners had been appointed, and had actually been nearly or quite two years engaged in the settlement, when it may be presumed that the amount of the charges of each State was pretty nearly known, as well as the effect which a settlement of them according to the principles of the Articles of Confederation would have, Congress proceeded by their act of the fifth of August, 1790, to direct the Commissioners, in apportioning the debt of the Union among the States, to do it according to the number of polls which each should contain, as prescribed by the Constitution. Thus, sir, was the State of North Carolina, as well as some others, whose lands were of but little value compared with those of the commercial and wealthy States, deprived of every advantage which had been secured to them by the Articles of Confederation, without having any equivalent for the injuries they had been subjected to under that instrument; and this too when no one ever pretended that, by the Constitution, Congress possessed a power to alter the ratio. It is not possible to ascertain exactly the amount of the loss which any State sustained by this measure, because the gross amount of the accounts has "from motives of policy" been ever kept concealed. But by turning to the seventh volume of the old journals, in the year 1782, near the close of the war, we shall see what sum each State was required to raise of $2,000,000, apportioned among them under the Confederation; and comparing that with the sums which each had to pay of the $2,000,000 laid and collected, according to the ratio prescribed by the Constitution, we may form a pretty correct opinion of the effect which the measure had upon the different States. And it appears that of the $2,000,000 raised in 1782, under the Confederation, North Carolina (at that time including all the State of Tennessee) had to pay $148,000, and Virginia (at that time including all the State of Kentucky) had to raise $290,000. Whereas of the direct tax of $2,000,000 apportioned among the States, according to the principles of the Constitution, North Carolina and Tennessee had to pay $212,504, Virginia and Kentucky $387,132. From whence it results that North Carolina, in every two millions of the aggregate of all the charges of the several States against the Union, lost by the change of ratio the sum of $67,701, and Virginia $97,132. Then supposing the aggregate of the charges to have been but $24,000,000, and judging by the sum reported against the State of Delaware, and admitting she never paid one cent, it must have been very nearly double that sum. North Carolina must have lost by the change of ratio, the sum of $774,048, and Virginia $1,165,384. It would be an easy matter to show the effect which this measure had upon every State in the Union; but it would be foreign to my purpose, and I shall therefore decline it, with barely observing, that it is evident a considerable majority of the States were gainers by the measure.

In addition to the injury sustained by the State of North Carolina from the change of ratio, I must beg leave to mention another, which I have understood from the Commissioners who attended to the settlement of her accounts with the Union, she suffered from having her vouchers for currency certificates first reduced to their specie value, and then these as well as her specie certificates scaled at four shillings in the pound. By what authority, or upon what principle of equity or justice, the Commissioners felt themselves justified in doing this, I am at a loss to determine. The only reason assigned for it, as I have understood, was, that this was the rate at which the Legislature of the State had valued them. Now, sir, I admit that this was the sum at which the Legislature had rated her certificates; but it by no means follows as a consequence that the Commissioners, in the settlement of her accounts with the Union, did justice to her in giving her credit for them at the same rate. For, sir, it will be recollected that under the Articles of Confederation each State raised from its citizens, in the way most suitable to themselves, the different sums of money or supplies which Congress might require of them. It is also well known, that the great scarcity of specie rendered it necessary to resort to some expedient to supply the place of it, and that the first attempt was by issuing a paper currency, which depreciated rapidly, and in a short time fell upon the hands of those who held it. The next step was to issue certificates to those who either performed services, or furnished supplies in support of the common cause, purporting that the bearer was entitled to the amount thereof, either in currency or specie, from the State on whose account the service was performed or the supplies furnished. The paper currency which had been issued, having borne at the same periods in different States very different rates of depreciation, it was necessary, in order to do justice, that the Commissioners should be vested with power to scale the currency certificates in the different States, according to the value which the currency had borne in them respectively, and this power by the ordinance of May, 1787, was given them. Such, however, was the scarcity of cash in that State, that by far the greater part of the soldiers as well as others who had received even her specie certificates for services performed, or supplies furnished, had, some from necessity and others from a want of confidence in the Government, parted with them to speculators at about two shillings and six pence in the pound. This being a fact notorious to all, the Legislature of the State determined to do full justice to the speculator who had purchased the certificates at one eighth of their value, without oppressing the soldiers and others who had paid full price for them; and in order to effect their object, they passed certain acts by which they depreciated even their specie certificates to four shillings on the pound. And by way of recompense to the soldiers for the loss they had sustained from the depreciation on their certificates, they made them very liberal donations of the unappropriated lands of the State, giving to the common war soldier six hundred and forty acres. And here, sir, I will beg leave to remark, that these were not what are commonly called Crown lands, but lands which had been granted by the Crown before the Revolution. I make this remark, because I know it is the opinion of some of the Committee that all the States had a right to any lands which, previous to the Revolution, belonged to the Crown, while all admit that lands which had been previously granted by the Crown belonged properly to the State within whose limits it lay. Now, sir, if the Commissioners in settling the accounts of this State with the Union, did not think she ought to be credited at a higher price for her certificates than she, for the reasons just mentioned, had thought proper to set upon them, they should at least have given her credit for the lands which she had given her soldiers as a recompense for the depreciation of their certificates. It will not, I presume, be pretended that they were ignorant of any advance having been made on lands to her soldiers, because, in searching for the laws by which she had rated her certificates, they could not fail seeing the one by which she had granted the lands to her soldiers. The operation of this principle of the Commissioners must have been very partial, as few of the States had adopted similar measures for paying off their certificates; and that its operation must have been unjust, will be obvious to the weakest mind when it is recollected, that the Union had received from the citizens of North Carolina full value in the services and supplies for which these articles had been issued by the State. If the citizens of any State thought proper by their Representatives in their Legislature to consent to give up to the State sixteen shillings in every pound of the debt, which the State in complying with the requisitions of Congress had contracted with them, and which the State alone under the Articles of Confederation stood responsible to them for; could this justify the Commissioners in adopting a rule by which they were to be compelled to pay to the other States the sums they had consented to give up to their own? Certainly not. And yet, sir, no man will say that this is not the obvious effect of this principle adopted by the Commissioners in the settlement of these accounts. The exact amount of the injury sustained by the State of North Carolina, by this rule of the Commissioners, it is impossible to ascertain; but when we recollect the enormous quantity of certificates which from the scarcity of specie were obliged to be issued for the pay of the army, and purchase of supplies, we may fairly conclude that the loss to her from this measure, fell very little short of that which she suffered from the changes of ratio.

These, sir, were the two principal injuries sustained by the State of North Carolina in the settlement of her accounts with the Union, and are the whole that I should have troubled the Committee with, had not the gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. STANTON,) with a view, I presume, of showing that the settlement was as fair for one State as another, inasmuch as all suffered by it more or less, told us that his State had lost a very considerable sum by the operation of that part of the act of Congress of the fifth of August, 1790, which prohibits the Commissioners allowing any claim, which had not been allowed by the State producing it previous to the twenty-fourth day of September, 1788. By the operation of the same part of that law the State of North Carolina also lost nearly $100,000, which she has felt herself bound to pay principally to the heirs of those who had either fallen in the service or died soon after the close of the war, and had not come of age to claim their rights as early as the year 1788. The truth of this can be vouched by one of the present Senators from that State, as he was one of the board of auditors appointed by the Legislature to settle with the claimants, about the year 1791 or 1792.

I have now, sir, gone through the principal objections taken by the State which I have the honor to represent in part, to the settlement of her accounts with the Union, and I think it must be obvious to every candid person who has heard me, that if she had been settled with agreeably to the principles of equity by which the Commissioners under the ordinance of 1787 were directed to be governed, she must in the result have proved to be a creditor to a much larger amount than she has been reported to be in debt. By the change of ratio, admitting the aggregate of all the charges of the several States to have been but $24,000,000, she lost better than $770,000; by the very unjust rule adopted by the Commissioners in scaling her certificates she must have lost nearly as much, if not more; and by claims which were barred under the act of Congress of the 5th of August, 1790, she lost about $100,000, making in the whole better than $1,500,000. The sum reported against her is but little better than $500,000, from whence it results that instead of being reported a debtor she should have been a creditor for about $1,000,000. I feel myself bound to make this statement, after what has fallen from gentlemen, in the course of the debate, who have opposed the resolution upon the principle that they believe the settlement to have been just, or at least that it was made upon principles which operated nearly alike upon all the States. This, sir, it is evident was not the fact, for by the change of ratio a majority of the States were gainers to a very large amount, while the others were as largely losers; and the rule by which the specie certificates of North Carolina were scaled could not have applied generally, because there were but few of the States that had adopted the same method for extinguishing this part of their debt. But, sir, we have been asked by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. HASTINGS,) if there were such enormous injuries done to the States reported debtors by the settlement, why was it not objected to, and the error pointed out at first, when they might have been examined into and corrected with ease? Why has it been let alone till this late period, when there is not the most distant hope that, were the accounts opened anew, a settlement could be effected, that would prove even as satisfactory as the one already made, and against which we so loudly complain? I am convinced that the gentleman has not examined this subject with his usual accuracy, or he would never have asked such questions. The fact is, that the settlement has been complained of by the Representatives from the State of North Carolina, as well as several other States, ever since the report was made; and at the very session when it was first published an attempt was made to bring to light the principles upon which the Commissioners had settled the accounts, with a view, no doubt, that the errors which had arisen from them might be corrected, and justice done to those States which had been injured by them. To prove this fact, I must beg leave to read a resolution which will be found in the Journals of the first session of the third Congress, page 247, in the following words:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine into, and report on, the practicability of obtaining a statement of the principles on which the accounts of the individual States with the United States have been settled, and a statement of the several credits allowed in the said settlement."

This resolution, sir, it appears was lost on taking the question by yeas and nays, and among those who voted in favor of it, will be found the whole of the Representatives from North Carolina, as well as many members from other States. In the Journals of the same session it will be found that when the bill was on its passage providing for the payment to the creditor States of the balances reported in their favor, an attempt was made to extinguish the balances reported to be due from the debtor States, by adding a section to the bill in the following words: "And be it further enacted, that the balances reported by the said Commissioners, and carried to the debt of certain States, be and the same are hereby relinquished." The section was rejected, but the yeas and nays not having been taken on the question, we are not able to say, to a certainty, who voted for it or against it. There can, however, be but little doubt as to who were the advocates or opposers of this section, when we attend to its objects, and see who voted for and against the resolution just read. The Committee I hope are now satisfied that the report of the Commissioners has never been tacitly acknowledged to be just, by the State of North Carolina, as well as several other States; they have seen that at the very session of Congress to which the report was first communicated, an attempt was made to bring to light the principles upon which the settlement had been made, in order that its errors might be exposed and justice done; and this attempt, they have seen, failed of success. The reasons why it failed I leave the Committee to conjecture for themselves. It also appears that at the same session an attempt was made to extinguish the balances reported against the debtor States, and the Journals will show that repeated attempts have since been made for the same purpose, but that these attempts have uniformly failed of success.

The reasons which may have induced Congress formerly to reject the measure I know not. But I doubt not in the least, that the ingenuity and industry of the gentlemen who have on this occasion with so much zeal opposed the resolution, have enabled them to assign every reason against the measure which the nature of the case would possibly admit. In the first place all agree that the General Government does not possess the power of enforcing the payment of the balances, against the consent of the States. But the gentleman from Maryland thinks that, by continuing to refuse to extinguish the balances, the States may at length be induced to accept of offers to lay out either the whole or a part of the sums they owe, either in turnpikes, fortifications, or some other work of public utility within their own limits, as has been done by the State of New York formerly. What the State of New York or any other State may be induced to do, I cannot pretend to say, but I think I can venture to predict, that the gentleman will to a certainty be disappointed in any expectations of this nature which he may have calculated on from the State of North Carolina, and that for the reasons I have already mentioned. And really the gentleman must be much more sanguine in his expectation than I am, if he entertains any serious hopes of ever getting anything more, voluntarily, from the State of New York. Another plan has been hinted at by a gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. ELMER,) by which the balances might be collected, which is by funding and apportioning them among the different States; but the gentleman had not the goodness to tell us how large a sum we should have to fund, or how it would have to be apportioned among the several States to carry his plan into effect. I wish he had done it, because I am convinced, if he had, it would have furnished one of the strongest arguments in favor of the resolution that could possibly have been adduced. My reason for thinking so is, because I do believe this is the only way in which the balances ever will be collected; and should the reins of this Government ever fall into the hands of men who believe, as some great men do, that a national debt is a national benefit, this will become a pretext for making a very large addition to the national debt; a thing which I conceive a very considerable majority of this Committee would not only discountenance, but would use their utmost exertions to prevent, and would of course advocate the resolution for extinguishing the balances altogether, rather than leave a pretext to those who may succeed them, for adding so largely to our national burdens. These are the only plans which have been suggested for collecting the balances; there are few I believe of the Committee who have any hope of ever getting them upon the one suggested by the gentleman from Maryland, and a still smaller number who would ever wish to see them collected upon the plan suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey. What injury then can possibly arise from the adoption of the resolution? I confess I can see none. It is true, some gentlemen have said that it would excite in the States reported creditors a fear that attempts would be made to wipe off the balances which have been funded for them. The weakness and fallacy of this argument has been so ably shown by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SMILIE,) that I will not take up the time of the Committee in attempting to refute it; but will proceed to state what in my humble opinion will be the good effects resulting from an adoption of the resolution. In the first place I believe it to be certain that the State of Delaware will be relieved from the most distressing embarrassments. In the next place we shall remove a bone of contention, which in all probability would, on some future occasion, be the cause of some legislative bargain, that in effect may be extremely injurious to the Union. The unusual anxiety of the members upon this subject, at this time, justifies a belief that this will be the case, particularly should any attempt ever be made to collect the balances. In the third place we shall prevent a future waste of much of the precious time of this House on a subject which tends to excite too highly the feelings of a large portion of its members; and lastly, we shall take from those who may succeed us, and be disposed to add to the national debt, a pretext which would be but too favorable to their design.

As then I do not see that any real injury can, but on the contrary, that very considerable benefits certainly will follow, from carrying the object of the resolution into effect, I shall conclude with expressing my earnest hope that it may meet with the support of a majority of the Committee.

The resolution was further supported by Messrs. SMILIE, MACON, and MITCHILL, and opposed by Messrs. HASTINGS, GREGG, BOYD, SLOAN and DAVIS.

The Committee now rose, without coming to a decision, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, January 18.

Mr. DENNIS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to incorporate the Washington Building and Fire Insurance Company; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the captors of the Moorish armed ships Meshouda and Mirboha:" Whereupon, the said amendment, together with the bill, were committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. NEWTON observed that Congress having assumed jurisdiction over the Territory of Columbia, it became their duty to prevent laws existing therein from being oppressive in their operation. At present a person, though a citizen of a particular State, and prosecuted in his State for debt, might be held to bail in the Territory, without obtaining relief. Mr. N. after stating a recent case of this nature, moved the appointment of a committee to inquire whether any, and if any, what alterations are necessary to be made in the laws of the District of Columbia relative to holding persons to bail.

The resolution was agreed to, and a committee of five members appointed.

STATE BALANCES.

The House again went into a Committee of the Whole on Mr. RODNEY's motion to extinguish State balances.

MR. RODNEY.—I hope I shall receive the indulgence of the Committee in replying, in a very concise manner, to the remarks of gentlemen against the resolution which I have had the honor of submitting. The strong ground taken by the friends of the motion has not, in my opinion, been shaken by anything which has fallen from those who are opposed to it. We have stated that there exist on the books of the Treasury certain balances against particular States, which are productive of great injury to them, while they do not and cannot benefit the United States one dollar. Have gentlemen pointed out any mode in which the amount of these balances is to be obtained? Have they shown the way in which the United States can legitimately obtain a single cent? Have not gentlemen admitted that so far as these balances apply to the State I have the honor of representing, they affect her citizens most oppressively—that they sit like an incubus upon her, producing a stagnation in the culture and improvement of her lands, in the increase of the trade and commerce, and thereby checking the vital current of the country? And when the United States reap no benefit, will gentlemen say it is politic or just to keep them suspended over her head? What is their worth to the United States? If they should be taken to market, what would they bring? Is there a visionary speculator in the land that would bid sixpence for them? Do gentlemen contemplate compelling the payment of these balances? The amendment to the Constitution, inhibiting the suability of States, has put that remedy out of their reach forever. Do they expect that any State will voluntarily pay them? No. If then this is the situation of the business, is the object worth the candle consumed in discussing it on this, or on any other occasion? When the United States cannot pocket a cent from the continuance of these balances, and they are so injurious to some of the States, will the Government of the Union suffer the interests of those whom they are bound to protect to be thus seriously sported with?

By attention to the law passed by Congress on this subject, it will abundantly appear that it was never contemplated that the debtor States should make payment. For it appears to have been believed that every State in the Union had exerted itself in the common cause to the utmost; that the blood of the citizens of Delaware had been mingled with the blood of the citizens of South Carolina; that the citizens of the different States had fought, bled, and died together; that they had been confined in the same prison-ships, had inspired the same impure air, and had died alongside of each other, and their bones are now bleaching on the same shores. That such was the intention of the framers of the law appears from this strong circumstance: It provides for the payment of the balances due to the creditor States, while there is no provision for the payment of the balances of the debtor States. For is there in that law any provision to compel the payment? Is there any direction to the Attorney General, or to any other organ of the Government, to prosecute the recovery of them? While there is a provision for funding the balances of the creditor States, the law is altogether silent as to any provision to coerce the payment by the debtor States of their balances. Am I not fully justified, therefore, in saying that coercion was never intended?

I fear that on one point I have been misunderstood. I stated yesterday, in the outset of my remarks, that it was my decided opinion, that the Commissioners had acted to the best of their judgments and according to honest consciences. I did not impeach their motives. I did not mean to be understood as desiring to touch the settlement they made. I afterwards, however, stated that from the nature of the country, comprehending an extensive range of communities of various habits, engaged in a revolution in which they were contending for the rights conferred upon them by God and nature, it was impossible, or extremely improbable to avoid the commission of honest mistakes: and that if this reasoning were supported, it would afford an additional reason why the United States should extinguish these balances. But did I question the justice of the proceedings or the motives of those who made the settlement? I did not. The utmost extent to which I went was that which I have just stated.

There is another point on which my remarks have been misconceived. I observed that by keeping in suspense these balances consequences might take place, by which the interests of States, now hostile to the extinction, might be seriously compromised. I did not say a bargain and sale might be made of these interests. I hope no such thing as this can take place. But I said a compromise might be effected, and I spoke of what might happen from what has happened. In this I find myself supported by the language of a respectable member in this discussion. I did not use this argument in the way of a threat; but I stated a fact, and, reasoning from experience and from human nature, I calmly inquired of the intelligence of the Committee whether such a thing might not possibly occur, and whether the possibility of its occurrence was not a strong reason for removing everything of the kind.

As long as these balances remain suspended over the heads of the debtor States they will be monuments of the imbecility of the General Government, and will, in the eyes of the world, present an unfavorable aspect of the disposition of several of the States to that Government. They will show that several States refuse to comply with the demands of the General Government, and that the General Government has not power to make them comply. Ought not the Government, on this ground alone, when it is acknowledged on all hands that she is unable to exact these debts, and when their continuance operates so injuriously to several of the States, to abandon them?

I will take the liberty of noticing one or two other remarks which have fallen from different gentlemen in the course of this discussion. In this notice it is my wish to be brief, as the subject is so clear to my mind. My only wish is that I were the Representative of one of the creditor States, that I might plead with the greater effect the cause of the debtor States, believing, as I do, that this circumstance would not alter my opinion.

While gentlemen repel the charge made by us against the equitable operation of the settlement of the Commissioners they acknowledge that settlement, so far as it regards their own States, to be unjust. Because they have not been allowed a full indemnity for the services and supplies they have rendered, they are unwilling to suffer these balances to be extinguished so far as they bear hard upon the debtor States. They say, because they have suffered, they desire some companions in their misery. I do not think this a strong argument in their favor. On the contrary, I consider it as one of the strongest arguments for an extinguishment, as by the acknowledgment that the operation of the settlement is unequal, it lessens the obligation of the Government to adhere rigidly to it.

Let us then put this subject on its true grounds, let us view these balances, as they ought to be viewed, as not worth a pepper-corn to the Union, as not worth the time that is spent in this discussion; and, under this view, let gentlemen be asked what they sacrifice by giving them up. They abandon nothing that is valuable; while on the contrary they throw away the last apple of discord, and pave the way to the final closing of this unpleasant business.

But it is contended that the moment you extinguish these balances, you revive a right in the United States to call on the creditor States for a repayment of the balances funded in their favor. But surely this cannot be considered as a natural inference. Is such a principle assumed as the ground on which our arguments in favor of the extinguishment rest? Have we not, on the other hand, declared and pledged ourselves, that so far as regards the balances reported in favor of the creditor States, it is our desire that they may remain sacred forever. Those balances have been funded, and interest has been and is now receiving on them. They were given for their exertions in the common cause, and ought therefore to remain untouched. Besides, in the bill which will be brought into the House should this resolution pass a clause can be inserted making the stock now held by creditor States transferable to whom they please. Forgive us our balances and you heal the only remaining wound of the Revolution. With this view of the subject we ask gentlemen, yielding to a liberal and magnanimous spirit of accommodation, to agree to extinguish that debt whose continuance cannot benefit them, while it seriously injures us.

Mr. SOUTHARD.—I rise, Mr. Chairman, to give a reason for the vote I shall soon be called upon to give. Every member of this House who has preceded me on this question has drawn conclusions, and founded his opinion in favor of the State he represents, arising from the partial and circumscribed knowledge he has of the subject under consideration.

Gentlemen appear to have formed their judgment of the justice of the report of the Commissioners from what they themselves have seen or heard of the sufferings of the respective States from whence they came, during the Revolutionary war with Great Britain.

Were I, Mr. Chairman, to take the same ground and point out to you—by taking a view of the sufferings of the State I have the honor to represent—the supplies she furnished and the services she rendered, it would appear that she would not yield to any other State in the Union.

But I acknowledge my information is too limited to form my opinion from this source. I consider the Commissioners who settled the accounts between the United States and the individual States, and who reported those balances, as having been men of talents, knowledge, and integrity, mutually chosen by all the parties concerned; and that each State, by their agent, furnished them with the evidences of their respective claims, and therefore as standing on higher ground than any member on this floor, and possessed of more information on this subject than this House collectively.

It was well observed by the gentleman from Delaware who introduced this resolution into the House, that those balances were occasioned by, or grew out of the war. It was a common danger, sir, that pressed these States into the Union for their mutual defence against a powerful enemy. The old Congress under these circumstances entered into a Confederation, and resolved, that to defray the expense of the war, on final settlement, each State should bear its just proportion of the expense of the war, according to the principles therein prescribed. In pursuance of this object Commissioners were appointed, and several laws have been passed by Congress for the purpose of carrying those resolves into effect.

I consider, Mr. Chairman, the settlement just, from the subsequent acts of the National Legislature. The report of the Commissioners was accepted by the parties concerned, and the balances due the creditor States funded. But they went further; the State of New York actually paid about $250,000 in part of the debt due from her. The Legislature of Pennsylvania made provision for the payment of the whole sum due from that State. North Carolina, another debtor State, and who was so much opposed, if I am rightly informed, when she ceded to the United States a part of her territory, now the State of Tennessee, bound the citizens of that district to pay their proportion of this debt. This, however, I am not certain of; I have it only from information. If I am wrong, the gentlemen from that State will correct me.

JANUARY, 1804.

State Balances.

H. OF R.

I adduce these facts to show in what light Congress viewed this subject at the time when the Commissioners made their report. I presume the National Legislature at that time, though less in number, were as competent to judge of the justice of the settlement as this House now is, though more numerous.

But gentlemen in favor of extinguishing the balances, say the debtor States will not pay; and if they would, that there is no way pointed out for them to do it. If they will turn to the act of Congress passed February 15, 1799, they will there find that there is a way provided by law for these balances to be paid.

I am opposed to the resolution to extinguish, because it tends to weaken and destroy the confidence of the citizens of the United States in their Government, for the hand that would blot out the balances due from the debtor States has the same power to wipe off the whole debt funded in favor of the creditor States; the principle is the same, for if the report be unjust as to the debtors, it is so as to the creditors.

But the gentlemen ask, what advantage is there in holding those balances hanging over their heads? I answer, I consider them as a security for the payment of the debt already funded. Believing as I do that the settlement made by the Commissioners between the United States is as just as the nature of the case and the difficulties attending it would admit of, I hope the resolution on your table will not prevail.

Mr. VARNUM.—The resolution under consideration is for the extinguishment of the balances due from several of the individual States to the United States, as appears by a report of Commissioners appointed to adjust and finally to settle the demands of the several States for services rendered and supplies furnished the United States in the late Revolutionary war with Great Britain. This report was made on the 5th day of December, 1793. The whole amount of the balances due from the debtor States, and which is now proposed to be extinguished, is $3,517,582. This resolution is supported on the ground that the settlement was unjust, and consequently that the balances found by it were improper and not due; and in fact, sir, I cannot conceive of any other ground on which an extinguishment could be supported, for it is evident that the debtor States are not deficient in ability to pay that which they justly owe; and if not deficient in ability, surely no other consideration can be sufficient to exonerate them from the payment. No principle, either political or moral, can justify an individual or a State in holding property justly due to another without the consent of the individual or State to whom it is due. In order to establish the position that the settlement was unjust, the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. RODNEY) has produced a document from the Comptroller of that State to show that Delaware did comply with the requisitions of Congress for a part of the time in which the United States were engaged in the war. And if it is granted that the statement is true, does that prove that the settlement was unjust? No, sir, nor would any documents which can be produced of the services rendered by that State go to prove the fact without contrasting them with the services rendered by the other States in the Union; and gentlemen very well know that this cannot be done without a revision of all the documents of the services rendered and supplies furnished by each State in the Union during the whole of the war. Will Congress undertake to do this? If they will not, the documents which the gentleman has referred to must go for nothing. In fact, sir, they prove nothing relative to the question under consideration. Several other gentlemen have expatiated on the services rendered by the debtor States to prove that the settlement was unjust; and, sir, I might with as much propriety go into a detail of the services rendered by the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor to prove the reverse; but this might also be considered irrelevant to the question before you. Yet, as gentlemen have taken this ground, in justice to Massachusetts I shall be permitted generally to say that she was second to no State in the Union in point of exertion for the general defence during the whole of the war. Her exertions in furnishing men and supplies were general, uniform, and without a parallel. History does not in my opinion, since the first formation of civil government, give you an instance of any people ever having paid, according to their numbers and wealth, in the same length of time, so great an amount in specie value as was paid by the way of direct taxes by the people of Massachusetts in the ten years the next subsequent to the year 1777. At the close of the war, towns and individuals were deeply involved in debt, which had grown out of their exertions to furnish supplies for your armies, and to hire soldiers to fight the battles of the country, at a time when the credit of the nation could not produce them. The pressure of those debts, and the exorbitant taxes which had been unavoidably imposed by the State, drove the people into an insurrection, which, for a considerable time, assumed an aspect which threatened the destruction of all the fair prospects which had been acquired by the Revolution; but, thanks to Heaven, this insurrection happily subsided. But notwithstanding all their exertions, the assumption of a part of the debt by the United States, and the payment of the balance found due on the settlement in stock of the United States, yet, after all, the State was burdened with an unwieldy debt, which grew entirely out of the transactions of the war, and for the gradual extinguishment of which a heavy direct tax has from that period to the present time been annually imposed on the people, and must continue for years to come before the debt can be entirely extinguished. This being the case, while some of the debtor States have glided easily along without the imposition of a direct tax to the amount of a single cent for the discharge of the expense of the war during the many years which Massachusetts has labored under this pressure of taxation, has induced gentlemen the best informed on the subject to doubt whether the services of that State had all been taken into the account ; but, sir, although the settlement was supposed to bear hard on that State, the people were determined to make the best of their situation, and not complain of a settlement which was made under so much solemnity, and, as they conceived, with the most upright intentions, so far as the perplexed state of the accounts would permit, to do equal justice to all the States.

The honorable SPEAKER, in order I presume to enforce on the minds of the gentlemen of this House the injustice of the settlement, has stated that the Commissioner of the great middle department has, since the report was made, stated on the floor of Congress "that those balances ought to be extinguished, and if it were not done, that he would unfold a tale which would make the hair stand on end, or some strong expression of that kind." The SPEAKER did not mention the name of the Commissioner who he said had uttered this sentiment ; but being so clearly designated that every gentleman present must know the Commissioner alluded to, there can be no harm in mentioning his name ; I conceive it must be General Irwin. When I look at the report and find that General Irwin is the first Commissioner who signed, it is difficult for me to reconcile the statement of the honorable Speaker with this document ; and when I recur to a more recent transaction, I am confident there must have been some misunderstanding in regard to the General's declaration, (for I am sure the honorable SPEAKER would not intentionally misrepresent it.) General Irwin did not only sign the report of the Commissioners, but there is at this time a letter in the possession of a gentleman of this House written by General Irwin since the commencement of the present session of Congress, and to which his signature is subjoined, stating that all possible pains was taken by the Commissioners to do equal justice to all the States in that settlement.

Now, sir, will this Committee conclude that General Irwin had, ten years ago, any frightful tale, to develop which would evince the injustice of this settlement ? Or will they not rather conclude that his signature, subjoined to the report under the solemnity of an oath, (for all the official transactions of the Commissioners were done under that solemnity,) together with his statement in the letter which I have mentioned, afford sufficient evidence that he has always considered the settlement a just one ? Another objection to the justice of the settlement is, because the expense of the war was not apportioned among the States by the value of their lands, agreeably to an article of the Confederation. It is an old adage that consent takes away error, and it is true that that mode of settlement was adopted by the unanimous consent of all the States. When a recurrence is had to the history of the whole transaction, I believe it will be found that this objection has no weight. Sir, I am far from entertaining a wish in the least degree to depreciate the exertions of any State in the Union in the Revolutionary war. I know they all made great exertions. Yet, sir, I presume it will not be derogating from the merit of any State to say, that the exertions of some of the States exceeded those of others. It is well known that in some of the States many of the citizens were inimical to the cause in which we were engaged, and did all in their power to assist the enemy in subduing our common country. This was a misfortune, although local in its operation, that was general in its effects, and it was generally lamented. Yet it did by no means detract from the merit of those citizens who were friendly in the same States ; but it goes to show that those States in which it happened did not, nor could not, do as much towards the common cause as those who had nothing of the kind to impede their exertions ; and, consequently, the improbability of the settlement being unjust as it relates to those States which stand the most indebted to the United States.

The ordinance which passed the old Congress in 1787, authorizing the settlement of the accounts of the several States against the United States, for services rendered and supplies furnished, during the war, makes as ample and liberal provision for an allowance of all the accounts exhibited, as could possibly be expected, or even asked, by any of the parties to the settlement : it was founded on the principles of mutual compromise, and by the unanimous consent of all the States. By the conditions of the settlement agreed upon by that ordinance, the public faith of each State was solemnly pledged to all the other States, and the public faith of the United States was solemnly pledged to each individual State, that the settlement, and proportion of the debt allotted to each State, by the Commissioners thus mutually agreed upon and chosen by all the States, should be final and conclusive. Soon after the establishment of the present Government, in the year 1789, a law was passed by Congress for facilitating the settlement and for filling vacancies in the board agreeable to the principles of the ordinance of 1787, and so far as I have discovered by a recurrence to the Journals, this law passed without any opposition. In 1790 Congress again assumed the consideration of the subject, and passed a law which recognised all the principles of the ordinance of 1787, and provided that a distribution of the whole expense should be made among the several States, according to the first census under the present Constitution. This law was also passed by the almost unanimous consent of the House, and in the Senate, where the State sovereignties are more particularly represented, it appears by the journals to have passed without opposition. Thus, sir, from the first agreement of 1787 to the final close of the settlement, all the States were unanimous in the mode prescribed for settlement, and stood most solemnly bound to each other to abide by it ; and the public faith of the nation was, by the several acts of Congress on the subject, most solemnly pledged to carry it into effect.

Can the Legislature then relinquish these balances, without a violation of plighted public faith ? And yet will they undertake to do it ? Sir, it is a fundamental principle in the governments of all civilized nations to pay the most sacred regard to plighted public faith. And, sir, the friends of our Government have derived much consolation from the idea, that the United States would never suffer their national character to be stained by a violation of this important national principle. Yet, sir, from what has taken place, it has been believed, that the United States would not be behind any nation on the earth in the preservation of this public virtue. But, if the resolution on the table should be passed into a law, this valuable principle will receive a wound which may lead to fatal consequences. I must be permitted to doubt the power of Congress to extinguish these balances without the concurrence of all the States. The settlement having been made under a solemn agreement of all the States, where will you find a power vested in Congress to alienate the interest which any individual State has acquired in the balance in consequence of that agreement, and vest it in another State? No such power is expressed in the Constitution, nor can I conceive it to be implied by anything which is expressed in that instrument. If then Congress have no Constitutional power to make the extinguishment, will not the transaction be considered an innovation on the rights of individual States, as well as a dereliction of the public faith?

JANUARY, 1804.

State Balances.

H. OF R.

A gentleman from New York has said that the extinguishment could not be a violation of public faith, because Congress had already given up part of the debt. It seems to me that the gentleman's conclusion does not naturally follow the premises which he has stated, for if it could, under any circumstances, be considered a dereliction of public faith to extinguish these balances, it cannot at this time be considered the less so, merely on the ground of the Legislature having heretofore fallen into an error on the subject. The fact is, that Congress did, in 1799, pass a law for remitting the balances, on condition, that each debtor State would pay into the Treasury of the United States by a given period the amount of the sums which had been assumed by the United States, of their respective State debts prior to the settlement. But, sir, at the time of passing that law, and ever since, I have considered it in the same point of light as I do the resolution before you, and therefore cannot admit that as a circumstance in favor of the resolution. That provision has now expired, without being embraced by any of the debtor States, except in that which has been done by the State of New York, in fortifying her ports and harbors. If the State of Delaware had thought proper to have complied with this liberal provision, she might have been discharged from a debt of $600,000 for $60,000, but it seems that she prefers a total extinction to a partial payment. If the balances should be extinguished on the principle that the settlement was unjust, which is the only ground taken in favor of their extinguishment, I am apprehensive that this is only to be a stepping stone to a more favorite object. I mean the extinguishment of the balances due to the creditor States on the settlement: for, although these balances have been funded by the United States, it is well known that the evidences of the debt in the possession of the creditor States are not transferable, so that Congress will have nothing to do to effect this part of the business, but to order payment to the creditor States on those balances to be stopped. And if this House shall consider the settlement so entirely unjust as has been stated by some gentlemen, and in consequence thereof give their vote for the extinguishment of the balances due from the debtor States, I cannot conceive why the same principle might not with the same propriety be extended to stop payment to the creditor States; nor should I be surprised, if the one should be carried, at seeing a resolution laid upon your table, before the close of the present session, for effecting the other. And will not the same parity of reasoning which has been adduced on this occasion lead to the extinguishment of all the debts of the Nation? If $3,500,000 due to the United States is to be wiped off on a mere statement on this floor, that the settlement was unjust, without the least particle of evidence to prove the fact, will a pretext ever be wanting for passing sentence against any class of your public debt? Sir, I have always been an admirer of the system of government established in the United States. I have thought it the best calculated of any government on earth, to perpetuate national faith, and secure individual rights. I have entertained exalted ideas of the wisdom and economy of the present administration, and I have consoled myself on the pleasing prospects of the future prosperity and happiness of our nation. But, sir, I view the measure before you as calculated to veil those pleasing prospects, and excite fearful apprehensions for the honor and fate of our country.

The resolution was further supported by Mr. J. CLAY, and opposed by Mr. FINDLEY, and Mr. BEDINGER.

Mr. Root begged the indulgence of the House, for a few moments, while he briefly stated some of the reasons which guided his judgment in favor of the resolution on the table. Coming, as he did, from a State against which a large balance had been reported by the Commissioners, it would probably be expected that he should lend his feeble efforts in aid of its extinguishment. But, while making these efforts, he should not call in question the conduct of the Commissioners in striking these balances, nor inquire whether they were actuated by pure or impure motives. As the balances have been for a long time reported, and as the proceedings of the Commissioners, as well as the documents and vouchers on which they acted, are secluded from the public eye, he should suffer them all to rest together undisturbed, and confine himself to the justice and expediency of the measure.

If, said Mr. R. there is no probability that the debtor States, so called, will ever pay the balances reported against them, wisdom and sound policy require the passage of this resolution; else they may remain a source of future jealousy and hatred between the several States, and a subject of management highly prejudicial to the Union. Or are they, he inquired, to remain as a rod over the debtor States to whip them into compliance with some favorite measure? If this was the object, he thought it prudent to extinguish them at once. The national Treasury, he said, can never be enriched from this source, unless a voluntary payment shall be made by the debtor States, or the United States shall, by coercion, compel a payment. And although, according to the report of the Commissioners, there are several States which are nominally debtor, yet there are but three, viz: New York, Delaware, and North Carolina, which are, by that report, really debtor. And a voluntary payment on the part of those States cannot reasonably be expected: For you are told, Mr. Chairman, that Delaware cannot pay; and you are also told, by two honorable gentlemen from North Carolina (Mr. BLACKLEDGE and Mr. HOLLAND) that that State will not pay—and as one of the Representatives from the State of New York. I think I may with confidence assert that she will make no farther payment. She yet remembers, sir, that at the commencement of the Revolution nearly one half of her citizens were inimical to that cause which you venerate. She yet remembers, that early in that revolution her only avenue to the ocean was blocked up, and by that and other causes, growing out of the existing state of things, the price of her produce, and of her supplies furnished to the army, was deeply depressed. That State was the theatre of war almost during the whole conflict. Her western frontiers were burnt and pillaged by a savage foe, and her southern borders overrun by worse than savages. From her northern frontiers a formidable enemy penetrated into the very bowels of the State. Surrounded by these distressing scenes she not only raised her regiments and paid her quotas required by Congress, but also set apart, as bounty lands for her soldiers, a large tract of the most fertile part of the State. After having done and suffered so much, she could not but view with astonishment that enormous sum of more than two millions of dollars which was reported against her. Further, Mr. Chairman, the State of New York cannot believe that the act of Congress of the 15th of August, 1790, pointed out a fair and equitable mode of settlement. When men and money were called for, to carry on that war in which these expenses were incurred, that State had not more than half the population which she possessed at the time this act was passed. The quota of expenses, therefore, which were charged to her according to this ratio, were nearly double to what it would have been, had a settlement been made, by the same ratio, at the close of the war. Had her quota been fixed according to her population at that period, it is presumed that she would have been reported a creditor instead of a debtor State. That State must therefore think that this enormous balance is an unjust and an unreasonable demand. And if she thinks it unjust, it is enough; for whether the settlement is just or unjust, if a State thinks it unjust the result is the same; she will not voluntarily pay.

But, said Mr. R., perhaps we shall be told that the State of New York has already made appropriations for complying with the terms offered by the act of Congress of the 15th of February, 1799, and that she has actually expended in the defence of the port of New York, and for which she is credited on the books of the Treasury, to the amount of $220,000, and that thereby she has acknowledged the justice of the demand, and will pay the residue. But, let gentlemen remember that, at that time, a momentary frenzy had seized upon the people of the United States, to wage war upon the Republic of France. And was it strange, he inquired, that the Legislature of that State caught the contagion? When the General Government had either refused or neglected to fortify her ports, was it strange that she should attempt to defend herself against the danger of an invasion, then supposed to be imminent? Since that frenzy has subsided, it is presumed that New York will not make a further waste of money, in compliance with the terms of the act of 1799. And, besides, sir, should the debtor States, for a moment, suppose the settlement to have been equitably made, and that the balances are justly due, we should probably find each State withholding a payment till other debtor States had paid the balance reported against them. Thus, by each State's waiting for others to go forward, you would find that no payment would be made. If you can have no reasonable expectation that these balances will ever be voluntarily paid, why retain them on your books? Do you intend, by coercion, to compel a payment? In what manner, I beg to know, will you institute suits against the debtor States? Will you bring a State sovereignty to bend at the feet of your courts? I presume not, since you have amended the Constitution respecting the suability of States. Will you sequester their stock in the funds, if they should happen to hold any, and thus violate the national faith? And will you lay a direct tax upon the United States, and remit the same to the creditor States, and thus indirectly evade the Constitutional provision that direct taxes and representation shall be according to a certain ratio? Or will you, as the last resort, put the debtor States out of your protection, and send your fleet to block up their harbors? I presume you will not, especially when you reflect that the people of New York alone pay more than one-fourth of all your duties on imports and tonnage. This is too considerable an item in your revenue to be wantonly thrown away.

But, Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested that the enormous balance reported against the State of New York proceeds from the assumption of the State debts, and that she is bound in honor to pay, and will pay, the amount assumed for her. In reply to this suggestion, permit me to remark, that the sum which was assumed for her was not equal to her proportion of the aggregate amount of State debts assumed. The sum assumed for New York was $1,183,716 69. The aggregate amount assumed for the several States was $18,271,787 47. Hence, it will appear that, according to the ratio for settling the accounts as established by the act of 1790, the proportion of New York of that aggregate sum is $1,715,169 78; which is $532,453 09 more than the sum assumed for that

H. OF R.

State. Less sums were also assumed for Delaware and North Carolina than their respective proportions of that aggregate.

Another objection is made to the resolution on your table, that its passage will affect the credit of the creditor States; and one gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SOUTHARD) has gone so far as to say that the same power which can extinguish these balances, can wipe off the whole funded debt; and my friend from Massachusetts (Mr. VARNUM) expressed a belief that the passage of this resolution is a violation of public faith. But I must confess, sir, my total inability to perceive the force of these observations. If Congress possess the physical power by one Legislative stroke to wipe off the whole funded debt, yet, if that power cannot rightfully be exercised, I trust it will not be exercised at all by this House. And I cannot see that, because you remit to your debtor that debt which he claims to be unjust, you thereby destroy the credit of your creditors. Or, does it necessarily follow that if an individual remits the supposed debt, that he, by the same act, destroys the bond of his creditors? Those States in whose favor balances were reported have funded those balances, and the national faith is pledged for the payment. And I trust that this nation will continue to preserve its faith inviolate.

Permit me, sir, to add, if the extinguishment of these balances is a violation of public faith and a destruction of the credits of those States who have funded the balances reported in their favor, that that faith is already violated and those credits are already destroyed. For, by the operation of the act of 1798, had the debtor States complied with its proffered terms, the balance against New York of more than two millions, with interest, would have been paid with less than eight hundred thousand dollars, and the six hundred and odd thousand dollars against Delaware would have been paid with about fifty thousand. And the same principles which gave you a right to remit a part, gave you a right to remit the whole. If the extinguishment of the whole will give a deadly blow to public faith, I should think that the remission of so large a part had, at least, inflicted a mortal wound.

From a full view of this subject, Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that if you retain these balances as a rod over the debtor States, you will only excite jealousy and animosity among the members of this Union, without deriving any benefit to the nation. Permit me, therefore, to express a hope that a majority of this Committee will be in favor of sponging them out of the books of the Treasury.

Mr. LEIB said that he never rose to give an opinion on that floor but with reluctance, and he should not then have risen but for the demand of the yeas and nays on the question. As he had heretofore voted against a similar proposition to that on the table, he felt it a duty he owed himself, as the vote was to be recorded, to assign his reasons for rejecting the report of the Committee of the whole House and voting in favor of the resolution.

This is not a new question. It had been repeatedly before Congress and before the public since he had had the honor of a seat on that floor. He should not inquire whether the accounts upon which the balances were predicated had been fairly liquidated or not; whether the sums were justly due; nor should he examine which of the States had rendered most services to the nation. These considerations with him bore not upon the case. The question had simplified itself to his mind and lay in a narrow compass. It had resolved itself into this: Can or will these balances ever be paid? If they cannot, nor will not be paid, there ought to be an end to the inquiry, and an end to the demand. It had been said, during the discussion, by a gentlemen from New York, that when this subject was formerly under consideration, New York sold out the stock which she held in the funds of the United States, lest it might be sequestered for the payment of her balance. Can anything evince a stronger hostility to the payment of this claim than this fact? And yet, with this open declaration against the payment of the balance due by her, we are to persist in continuing the claim! As New York has manifested her determination not to pay, what mode of coercion has been suggested? None. No one has pretended to say that these balances ever can, or ever will be collected. If New York and North Carolina will not pay, can Delaware discharge the claim against her? With her what process is to be pursued? Is she to be sent to auction and sold to the highest bidder? And if gentlemen are willing to put her under the hammer of the auctioneer, who is to be the purchaser and how is the sale to be enforced? The justice of these balances has been contested, nay, it has been flatly denied; it is not to be expected, therefore, that the debtor States would willingly discharge them, and as no feasible mode of enforcing payment has been or can be suggested, policy and economy call for their extinction.

It would be well for gentlemen, who are for keeping alive this demand, to calculate its cost to the nation, and then, perhaps, they would feel less reluctance to the surrender. Large sums are spent in the discussion, and the time and the purse of the people very unprofitably employed. In his apprehension, therefore, it would be a saving to the United States to pass the resolution. It is idle to keep up a demand which never can nor never will be satisfied; he hoped, therefore, the House would agree with him in rejecting the report of the Committee of the Whole and adopting the resolution.

Mr. HOLLAND.—It is to be expected that gentlemen representing various parts of the Union, and particularly those who were eye-witnesses to the hardships experienced under the Revolutionary war, will be led to think that the distresses they saw, and the exertions performed immediately within their own view, were not equalled in any other part of the continent. That this is the case, we have sufficient evidence by the declarations of many honorable gentlemen on the present question. A gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. THATCHER) has said, that the States of New England had suffered and done more for the obtaining of independence, than what had been done or suffered by the Southern States. That we are greatly indebted to the prowess of our Eastern brethren, that they were unanimous in sentiment, prompt, and fought many a well-fought battle in the Revolutionary war, and acquitted themselves with honor, I am not disposed to deny, and that we are greatly indebted to them for the bold, intrepid manner of their conduct against the common enemy; and that it was by the exertion of those patriots with that of those throughout the Union that procured our independence.

The patriots in New England, being of one sentiment, had only to contend with the common enemy; a contention which, when compared with that of their Southern brethren, will be found to be unequal in exertion, honor, or consequences. The Eastern was a foreign, the Southern a foreign and civil war. In the East they could, without suspicion of being betrayed, collect together, and level all their forces against one object, and could retreat with safety into the bosom of their country. But there were no such advantages with us—we had no retreat. We had the common enemy on the coast, the savages on the frontier, and enemies within our own bosom. We were nearly equally divided, and it has never been decided which had the majority, and the controversy was not to be determined by argument but by battle, and battles were frequent, not of a people against a foreign foe, but a battle of neighbor against neighbor; and among the slain it was common to see acquaintances, neighbors, brothers, and sometimes a father who had fallen by the hostile arms and prowess of his son. It was a war the most distressing and intolerable of all wars, too much so to be further related. But I hope, after the imperfect sketch that I have given, the honorable gentlemen from Massachusetts will admit that their friends in the South have at least experienced their equal share of distress in the Revolutionary war. That the patriots of the South (and it was a war of patriots and not of States—States were only described by geographical boundaries, and boundaries that were yet to be contested for) have suffered in the contest equal to any given number of patriots in the States of New England; and let it be recollected that the object of the contest has, by the united exertions of those patriots, been obtained, and let us not tarnish it by invidious comparisons, or sully it by keeping in remembrance and repeated discussion this bone of contention; this old, dry bone that, as before stated by my friend from Delaware, has no nutriment upon it.

But perhaps the honorable gentlemen from Massachusetts draw their conclusions of the services performed by the Eastern States from the report of the Commissioners of Settlement. If this is the source from which those conclusions are drawn, I am convinced, upon examination, that it will also fail. Agreeably to this report, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Georgia, are creditor States. So that it appears from this document that the little convulsed State of South Carolina, not having a third of the population, has done within a few thousand dollars as much as the powerful State of Massachusetts, and that the two weakest States to the southward, and on the southern frontier, harassed, divided, and under British domination a great part of the time, have from this evidence done more, vastly more indeed, in proportion to their whole numbers, than was done by the two most powerful, unanimous, and wealthy States of New England. But this report is not to be relied upon, and when I say this, it is not my intention to impeach the integrity of the Commissioners who made it, nor to cast any reflection upon any one of the creditor States, touching the manner of keeping or exhibiting their accounts. But I mean to say, that the manner in which North Carolina kept her accounts and performed her services, was such that it was impossible that justice could have been done her in the settlement.

In the early stages of the Revolution, it never occurred to the Legislature of that State that they would be indemnified for any services but such as were done by the immediate order of the General Government. Of course, all the services performed for her immediate defence, such as expeditions against the savages—and there were several campaigns carried into the Indian country, and a continual line kept up on the frontier for protection against savage depredations during the whole war—together with a number of volunteer services to the aid of South Carolina and Georgia, against their internal and external enemies, with the perpetual services necessarily performed for the subjection of our own disaffected citizens—these services were sometimes volunteer, sometimes by draught, and sometimes it was made the duty of a given number to hire, clothe, and equip a soldier. This was done under a general sense of duty, without any expectation of private or public remuneration, other than the hope of an eventual freedom. What ground of hope existed? The paper money of every description had sunk to nothing, and the State had no fund to authorize even a hope for redemption. All was gone, and nothing remained but the most disinterested and vigorous exertion to secure the main object. And towards the close of the war the only place of safety was in the camp—a constant, unregistered service. Under these circumstances, can it be possible that we had justice in the settlement? Having no documents to be produced to the board, could we obtain a credit? The thing was impossible, but the services, nevertheless, were performed, for which, if we could have obtained a credit, would have placed us in a different position. There is one other case noticed by my colleague (Mr. BLACKLEDGE) of services actually performed in the Continental department that we had no credit for, owing to a fraud having been committed by the board for settling the army accounts. The Legislature thought proper to set aside and nullify the whole of these proceedings, and previous to their being again liquidated and settled, these accounts were barred by the act of Congress. The extent thus barred I am not advised of, but they were considerable.

I will now submit this case to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. GREGG,) who differed widely from his venerable colleague, whether, under all the above circumstances, and many more that might be cited, North Carolina had justice done her in the settlement; or whether it was possible for her to bring forward to the board the vouchers and evidences of the services she performed in the Revolutionary war. It appears to me, sir, upon this view of the case, that every impartial, honest, and candid mind, will be ready to conclude that the thing was impossible. And also, let honest candor examine the statement made by my friend from Delaware, (Mr. RODNEY,) and I think that the conclusion will most inevitably be, that the State of Delaware has not a fair settlement, and that it was impossible that she can be in arrears near $1,000,000.

These are the impressions that an impartial examination of this case has produced on my mind, and I am led to believe that many gentlemen representing the creditor States, and even bystanders, are obliged to coincide in the same general sentiment, to wit, that justice had not been done, and that justice could not be done in the settlement of the State balances; and as the gentlemen from the creditor States have at all times reproached a revision of settlement, and as the debtor States, from a conviction of the injustice of the demand, will not voluntarily pay it, and as there has been no means pointed out to compel the payment, why will you keep it up? But gentlemen say that they are not asking payment at this time. Why, if it is just, not ask it now? Why has the demand been so long delayed? A just demand gains nothing by delay. Why disguise this business? Would it not comport more with the dignity of this House and the honor of the creditor States to come out at once, and say in plain, unequivocal language what they intend to do? Is it kept over us as a rod to tantalize or to keep us in the back ground? Gentlemen will not avow this. Then for what other purpose? To this no explanation can be had. All is left to conjecture. And may we not suspect that there is a lying in wait to obtain power to demand, to enforce this measure? I hope this is not the case; but the holding it up attaches suspicion, that, if groundless, ought to be done away by a removal of the cause of it. I am further of an opinion that it was the intention of the old Congress, and of the Congress under the present Government, who passed the act of 1790, never to call upon those States who should be reported against for the balances, and all that was contemplated was to admit the creditor States to fund the excess. This has been done—and I am strongly impressed with a belief that nothing more was intended. If anything more was intended, it is reasonable to suppose that it would have been expressed either on the resolves of the old Congress, or in the act authorizing the Commissioners to make the settlement—a mode would have been pointed out as to the manner, time, or to whom, the payments were to be made. But not a syllable is expressed on that subject. And as to the creditor States, it is to be remarked that they are not entitled to all the privileges attached to common creditors; they are limited in the act that admits them to fund; they are not admitted to transfer their balances so funded, from which it may be inferred that it was a thing of compromise—that it was so understood, that creditors should not transfer and that the debtors were not to be called upon; that they were considered to be nominal, but not real debtors, and this for the purpose of raising and augmenting the funded stock. For, by adverting to the proceedings of those times, assuming and funding was the system—it was the common order of the day. But if it had been understood that under the legal operation of the act of 1790, that the States reported as debtor States were to be liable, the act would not have passed. A measure so dangerous would not have obtained. And from the conduct and expressions of one of the Commissioners at a subsequent session of Congress this opinion was also entertained by the Commissioners themselves; for this Commissioner, although he insisted that it was a just settlement, yet he advocated the extinguishment of these balances. Under all these circumstances I most sincerely hope that gentlemen will feel themselves at liberty to expunge from your record this demand by voting for the resolution on your table.

The Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, January 19.

The House, in pursuance of a resolution of the eleventh instant, proceeded to the hearing of William Cowan, agent for the Virginia Yazoo Company, at the bar of the House; and the said agent being heard, in part, on the subject-matter of the claims of said Company, retired from the bar.

Ordered, That the further hearing of the said agent be postponed until to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and four," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the motion of the twenty-eighth of October last, for the appointment of a committee "to inquire into the expediency of extinguishing the claims of the United States for certain balances reported to be due from several of the States to the United States, by the Commissioners appointed to settle the accounts of the individual States with the United States, with power to report by bill, or otherwise," as amended by the Committee of the Whole, and to which the said Committee yesterday reported their disagreement; and the said motion, as amended, being twice read in the words, following, to wit:

Resolved, That it is expedient to extinguish the claims of the United States for certain balances reported to be due from the several States to the United States, by the Commissioners appointed to settle the accounts of the individual States with the United States.

State Balances.

JANUARY, 1804.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said: This being a question of importance to the State I have the honor to represent, I will offer some reasons to the House in favor of the present resolution. I shall first contend that the act passed in the year 1790, was in violation of the original compact which was entered into by all the States, establishing the principles by which each State was to supply her part for the support of the Revolutionary War; and that, by changing that mode, it operated against the State of North Carolina. Secondly, that by the settlement which was made by the Commissioners, injustice was done to that State.

In making these remarks, I do not wish to be understood by the House that they ever ought to go into an examination of that settlement; but if, from the nature of things, any one State can show how she was injured, that will have considerable weight, and be a good reason to abolish those debts which are said to be due from the several States. In the eighth article of the Confederation, all charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence and general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of the common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States in proportion to the value of all land within each State, granted to or surveyed for any person, as such land, and the buildings and improvements thereon, shall be estimated according to such mode as Congress shall, from time to time, direct and appoint. In the twelfth article it is expressly declared that the articles of this Confederation shall be inviolably observed by each State: nor shall any alteration take place, unless such alteration be agreed to in Congress, and afterwards confirmed by the Legislatures of every State.

But a gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated that Congress unanimously agreed to change the eighth article of the Confederation; therefore, the act passed in 1790, saying that each State should pay in proportion to the number of inhabitants, was done by consent, and that consent would do away error; but if the gentleman will examine the case strictly, he will find he is wrong, for two States never did consent to alter the mode prescribed by the Confederation, and it is a principle which cannot be denied, that wherever parties enter into a contract, they must all consent before it can be altered; and I take the question now before us to be similar; for each in her sovereign capacity entered into that compact, and Congress had no more right to pass a law in violation of it, than we now have to pass a law directly in violation of the Constitution which we have sworn to support.

I will now endeavor to show that by changing the mode by which each State was to furnish her proportional part to support the war, it operated against the State of North Carolina. I believe after the close of the war it was nearly ten years before the number of the inhabitants was taken within the United States; during that period there was considerable emigration to that State, it being extensive in territory, and land very cheap. But let us consider what is the comparative difference between the price of land in the Northern States and in North Carolina. I believe, sir, at the time this settlement was made it was at least five to one, that is, one acre would sell for as much as five, therefore, in the same proportion as our population increased, and the inequality of the value of land, so much was the relative proportion of the debt changed, and thrown on the citizens of that State; and whenever a capitation tax is laid it always operates hard on that part of the community which are upon an equality and not very wealthy.

I will now show in what manner injustice was done to that State in the settlement of the accounts. In the year 1781 the Legislature passed a law giving full power to the board of creditors to settle and liquidate the claims of individuals for supplies furnished during the war, and fix the price of articles. In 1783 a law was passed fixing the scale of depreciation, and under those existing laws the Commissioners must have settled the accounts of that State, or it would be impossible for her to have been a debtor State. But it may be said that if the State passed laws which operated against her, it was not the fault of the General Government. But at that time we had not adopted the Federal Constitution, therefore each State had a right to pass such laws as would relieve her from a heavy debt which she had incurred in our struggle for liberty. Also, the very situation of our country rendered it impossible for an accurate account to be kept of the supplies furnished by the different States, when an enemy was ravaging our country; and if one State should have the good fortune to keep her accounts more accurate, she ought not now to wish to exact the sums stated to be due from her sister States. I believe there were few States in the Union which suffered more than the State of North Carolina, for she not only was ravaged by a foreign enemy, but a continual scene of distress was kept up by an internal enemy. A number of her citizens, after having furnished all they could spare to support our army, were, perhaps, the next day stripped of all their property, and nothing left to support their helpless families.

It appears that Congress repeatedly recommended to the several States, as well for hastening the extinguishment of the debts as also for the establishing of the harmony of the United States, to make liberal cessions of their territorial claims. The Legislature of North Carolina, taking the matter into consideration, not only made a liberal cession of her claims, but ceded all that extensive country which forms the State of Tennessee. This I take to be a strong reason why she ought to be released from her debt. The gentlemen who have spoken against the resolution, I take it, have not stated any solid reasons why the debts should not be abolished. They have contended that the settlement made by the Commissioners was a just one, and that it would be impossible to rectify the matter; and that if we release those debts, the creditor States may be called on to re fund the money they have received. I think neither of those positions are correct; for I believe the settlement was made in the dark, and in darkness it will remain. The total amount of the advances made by the several States, as fixed by the final settlement, is not known. Neither has the proportion of the debts been correctly ascertained. This matter has been kept a secret; and if the business had been conducted with such propriety, and settled fairly, why is it concealed from us? I am warranted to make use of these expressions from the proceedings of Congress.

After the adoption of the Federal Constitution, Congress was anxious to bring the matter to a close, and labored some time to effect it, but at last they assumed a debt of upwards of twenty millions of dollars, whereas it was only necessary to have assumed about eleven millions of dollars, and the same result which now exists might have been effected had they waited till the accounts had been settled; and thus they created a debt of upwards of ten millions of dollars. Therefore, Congress have, in the whole of their proceedings, shown clearly that they never intended to call on the debtor States, and that it was only necessary to make provision for those States which had a balance struck in their favor. Ought not, then, those creditor States be content, when they have had their debt assumed by the Government, and they are annually drawing interest for the same? And with respect to the objections which gentlemen have made, that by discharging the debtor States, it will be the means of destroying their debts, they are merely ideal. I believe there is not a person on this floor who is in favor of the resolution that has any such wish; neither do I think it ever will be attempted.

Some gentlemen have asked, if we release the debtor States, what is the quid pro quo? Have not the creditor States got their debts funded, and the faith of our Government pledged for the payment? But, independent of that, I think, sir, the liberty and freedom we now enjoy would be a sufficient quid pro quo. But there is one reason more, which I think alone would be sufficient to extinguish these debts. The cause which gave rise to them—that noble cause of liberty which gave to us our independence. It seems as if the God of Nature had destined this happy land of America the only asylum for liberty; and I would ask those gentlemen if it was not by the joint effort of all our sister States that we liberated ourselves from the hand of tyranny? Was it not owing to the supplies of the several States, be they great or small, that we are now breathing the air of liberty? Was it not by that noble impulse which filled the breasts of the American people with a thirst for freedom that gave birth to our Government? For in that momentous hour, when the fate of our nation was suspended on the wings of fortune, if one of our States had withdrawn her assistance from the Union, I believe we should not now be within these walls as legislators, but under the scourge of a Monarch. And in order to unite us more permanently under our present form of Government, I think it would not only be policy but justice to abolish these debts, which are said to be due, as it is impossible to know whether they were settled on principles of equity and justice between the several States; and it was a joint cause, and one which will always do honor to America as long as time shall last. I hope that the House will reject the report of the committee, and be of the opinion that the balances which are reported to be due from the several States ought to be extinguished.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Mr. Speaker: The State which I in part represent being one of those that are denominated debtor States, and being strongly impressed with a belief that the means by which she has become so are improper, I conceive it my indispensable duty to submit to the House my reasons for forming such opinion.

In endeavoring to perform this task, the first point that I shall attempt to establish is, that the act of Congress which fixed the ratio according to numbers, and under which the accounts were settled that produced these balances, was unconstitutional; and in order to prove this position, it may not be improper to give, for the information of those gentlemen who have not made themselves particularly acquainted with the subject, a concise statement of the proceedings of the old Congress relative to the matter now under consideration.

Permit me, sir, in the first place, to premise that when the King of Great Britain thought proper to commence a cruel and distressing war against the American colonies, for the purpose of reducing them into a state of passive obedience, it became their interest to unite for their security, and accordingly they associated and leagued together under certain terms and conditions, the whole of which are contained in what is known by the Articles of Confederation; the 8th of which declares that all charges of war and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence or general welfare shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States in proportion to the value of all land within each State, granted to or surveyed for any person, as such land and the buildings and improvements thereon shall be estimated, according to such mode as the United States, in Congress assembled, shall from time to time direct and appoint; and the thirteenth article thereof prohibits any alteration in any of them unless agreed to in Congress, and which shall be afterwards confirmed by the Legislature of every State. From which it may be perceived that the manner of settling, adjusting, and finally determining the proportions to be borne by the several States of the evidences of the war, was as completely fixed and established as the same by language could be done.

In the year 1782, in order to bring the accounts relative to those expenses to a final settlement, Congress appointed Commissioners for that purpose, and at the same time recommended to the several States, to authorize Congress in the final settlement of the proportions to be borne by each State of the expenses before mentioned, to adopt such principles as, from the particular circumstances of the several States at different periods, might appear just and equitable, without being confined to the rule laid down in the eighth article of confederation. This recommended alteration did not meet with the approbation of all the States; of course it failed, as the article intended to be amended or affected thereby remained untouched and unrevoked.

In the year following, they formally agreed to revoke that article, and in the place thereof declared that the charges and expenses of the war should be apportioned among the States according to numbers, which was submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, for their ratification; but, in this, as in the first attempt, they were also unsuccessful, some of the States deeming it contrary to their interest to adopt the same.

In the year 1787, the subject was again resumed by Congress; by passing an ordinance establishing a new board of Commissioners, with powers to make a final adjustment of all the accounts, agreeable to such quota as Congress should thereafter determine. If, sir, Congress meant by this ordinance to fix the rate of expense, agreeably to the eighth article, and to empower the Commissioners to make a final adjustment of all the accounts subsisting between the United States and the several members thereof, that principle was, in my opinion, correct; but if they intended thereby to declare their power of establishing the ratio upon any other principle, then I must be permitted to say that the ordinance is in direct violation of the terms of the Confederation, and therefore void; for I hold it to be a sound principle, that the old Congress had no powers but what were expressly given by the then federal compact, and whenever they exceeded the limits by that instrument prescribed to them, their acts are entirely invalid. Having shown, as I humbly conceive to the satisfaction of every reasonable gentleman, that the former Congress had no power to settle those accounts upon any principles, other than those under which they were contracted, I will omit further remarks on that point, and proceed to show that the Congress under the Federal Constitution are equally as destitute of such powers.

Sir, after the most deliberate examination I have not been able to discover anything in that instrument that either expressly or implicitly gives to them that power; but, on the contrary, find the sixth article positively declaring that all debts contracted, and all engagements entered into before the adoption of that Constitution, should be as valid against the United States under the Constitution as under the Confederation.

Will any gentleman pretend to say, that, when the expenses of the war are apportioned among the States, according to numbers, that the balances would be precisely the same that they would be when apportioned according to the value of the surveyed or granted land and improvements? I trust that no one will hazard that opinion.

It follows, then, of course, that if the balances due any of the States, upon the settlement of those accounts, according to the principles fixed by the act, are less than they would have been had the settlement been made according to the principles contained in the Confederation, those balances being due from the United States, are, so far as they are reduced, not as valid as they were under the Confederation; therefore, the act that fixes the standard by which they are reduced is contrary to the Constitution, and of course void.

By the seventh section of the first article of the same instrument, Congress has the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; not to add to or diminish, but to pay, the debts of the United States.

Having, as I conceive, in a clear point of view, proved the act under consideration unconstitutional, I will dismiss that point, and proceed to show wherein the alteration of the principles upon which the accounts ought to be settled affected and materially injured the State of North Carolina; in the doing of which, those circumstances necessarily will be mentioned which will serve to prove what I have already asserted, that the balances would have been different had the ratio been made upon the proper principles.

Mr. Speaker, that State being inferior in square miles to but few in the Union, gentlemen might suppose, without reflection, that her quota of the general expense, when calculated in the way I contend for, would be proportionately large. But, sir, I must be permitted to remark, that she had within her chartered limits a large quantity of surplus or unappropriated land, which was not by the Articles of Confederation to be taken into the valuation—that expressly declaring the lands granted or surveyed, with their improvements, only to be estimated.

There is, sir, another fact equally well founded: the lands in that State are of less value than the lands in any State within the Union. This, I conceive, has not arisen because they are of inferior quality, but principally on account of her difficult navigation. And perhaps I might not be far wrong in saying that one of the large Northern cities is worth half as much as all the lands in that State. From which, I may fairly conclude that her relative proportion in numbers is much greater than the relative proportion in the value of the surveyed or granted land and improvements. And in order to establish this fact, I will briefly state to the House the proportion in which the former Congress laid their requisitions on the several States in the year 1779. Fifteen millions of dollars were required, of which North Carolina had to pay one million and ninety thousand. In the same year, out of eighty battalions of troops, she had only to raise six; at another time two millions of dollars were required, of which she had only to contribute one hundred and forty-eight thousand. In none of these did her quota exceed one-twelfth part.

But, by the act of 1790, she had to pay one-tenth of the expense, as, by the first census, that was about her relative proportion in numbers. And as the aggregate amount of expense is at least thirty millions of dollars, (and less than that sum cannot be presumed,) her quota, according to numbers, was three millions of dollars. But, was it fixed according to terms on which the debts were contracted, allowing her proportion to be one-twelfth, then it would only amount to two millions five hundred thousand dollars—making a difference of five hundred thousand, which I consider as a dead loss to her by the change. I add to this a loss of upwards of one hundred thousand dollars in claims for services and supplies, which were prohibited by the act from being received by the Commissioners in the final settlement, as the certificates for the same were not issued previous to the 24th day of September, 1788; which two sums would make her a creditor State to the amount, at least, of one hundred thousand dollars, had the accounts been settled as they ought.

But, supposing for a moment that Congress had the power of varying the mode for settling those debts, the termination of the Revolutionary war was the most proper time for taking the census for that purpose: the debts then ceased to accrue. The act, sir, is predicated upon the supposition that the same or a proportionate state of things existed then that did when the debts were contracted, when the fact was really otherwise; for the unappropriated land already mentioned induced vast numbers to emigrate from States that did not possess those advantages, and from other parts of the world into the State of North Carolina; the consequence was, her increase of population was greater than those States that were not similarly situated, which may be proved by referring to her increase of representation beyond that of Connecticut, Rhode-Island, New Jersey, and others. Of course she had more to pay than she would have had if the census had been taken previous to this emigration. And what is this extra expense for? nothing that I can discover but because she did not compel those emigrants to grant supplies and perform services for the defence of the country, when they were not under her control, not being then inhabitants of that State, and, with respect to many, not citizens of any of the States. The injury sustained on this account cannot be precisely ascertained, but no doubt it was considerable.

Her injury however did not end here, for by an act of her Legislature the prices of a great part of the articles furnished the United States by her citizens were established in the then depreciated currency, and for which certificates accordingly issued, which when brought into the settlement were reduced, as I am informed, by the Commissioners, according to a scale of depreciation, to less than one-half of their real value; the amount of which loss must be enormous indeed.

Under all these circumstances, can any gentleman suppose that she will voluntarily pay any part of the balance reported against her? If they do flatter themselves with such expectations I humbly conceive, ultimately, they will discover their error; and will now conclude my remarks with a hope that the House will not agree to the report of the Committee of the Whole.

Messrs. SKINNER, EUSTIS, GREGG, and FINDLEY supported, and Messrs. RODNEY and LEIB opposed the report of the Committee of the Whole.

The question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the said resolution, and passed in the negative—yeas 65, nays, 67, as follows:

The question then recurring that the House do agree to the said motion, as originally proposed, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of extinguishing the claims of the United States, for certain balances reported to be due from several of the States to the United States, by the Commissioners appointed to settle the accounts of the individual States with the United States, and that the said committee have power to report by bill, or otherwise—

Mr. VARNUM moved to amend it, by adding:

"And that provision ought to be made to pay to the creditor States, in the stock of the United States, their respective proportions of the whole amount of said balance, in the ratio prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for the apportionment of direct taxes among the several States."

On this amendment a debate ensued, in which it was supported by Messrs. VARNUM and R. GRISWOLD, and opposed by Messrs J. CLAY, BLACKLEDGE, FINDLEY, DENNIS and ALSTON.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved to amend the amendment by inserting after "proportions," the words "if entitled to any." Lost yeas 53, nays 64.

FRIDAY, January 20.

Ordered, That the petition of sundry citizens of the United States, resident in the Territory of Columbia, presented the 29th of December, 1801, "praying that a bridge may be erected from the western and southern extremity of the Maryland avenue, in the city of Washington, to the nearest and most convenient point of Alexander's island, in the river Potomac," be referred to the committee appointed, on the tenth instant, on a petition to the same effect, of sundry other citizens of the United States, resident in the said Territory of Columbia; to examine the matter thereof, and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred, on the eighteenth instant, the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the captors of the Moorish armed ships Meshouda and Mirboha," reported that the Committee had had the said amendment under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their disagreement to the same.

The House then proceeded to reconsider the said amendment of the Senate, at the Clerk's table: Whereupon, the amendment, together with the bill, were recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill to ascertain and provide for the salaries of the Judges of the Orphans' Courts in the District of Columbia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the sixth instant, the petition of sundry aliens resident in the city of Baltimore, and State of Maryland, have leave to report thereon by bill, or bills, or otherwise.

The House, in pursuance of a resolution of the eleventh instant, proceeded to a farther hearing of William Cowan, Agent of the Virginia Yazoo Company, at the bar of the House; and, thereupon, the said agent being fully heard, retired from the bar.

A petition and memorial of the citizens of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, signed in behalf of the said citizens, by Jacob Hoffman, their Mayor, was presented to the House and read, submitting certain propositions to the consideration of Congress, by way of amendments to their existing charter of incorporation; and praying that the same may be adopted, under such modifications and regulations as shall be deemed best calculated to promote the convenience and prosperity of the petitioners.—Referred to Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. GOODWIN, and Mr. DENNIS, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

MONDAY, January 23.

Another member, to wit: WALTER BOWIE, from Maryland, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House sundry letters of the same tenor, written in the German language, addressed to the "General Congress of North American Free States," from the Council of Directors of the city of Memel, in the province of East Prussia, and dated the 25th of May, 1803, stating "that a certain Charles Melvill, formerly a resident of the said city of Memel, had, about four years previous to the date aforesaid, removed from thence to Charleston, in South Carolina, and remains indebted to the Comptroller of the said city for two bills of exchange, amounting to twenty-four thousand seven hundred and nine florins, Prussian currency: that the said Charles Melvill, it is believed, died some time ago, possessed of considerable property; the said Directors, with great submission, request the honorable Congress of the United States to oblige them with such information as the nature of the case will admit, offering a reciprocation of services therefor.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee to whom were referred, on the twenty-fifth of November, sundry memorials of the people of the Mississippi Territory of the United States, made a report in part thereon; which was read and referred to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. N., also, from the committee to whom were referred, on the twenty-second of November last, and the fourth instant, the petition of sundry residents and purchasers of land in the State of Ohio, made a report, in part, thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

On motion, it was

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year 1804." Whereupon, the said amendments, together with the bill, were committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate governments," together with the report of a select committee thereon, made the thirtieth ultimo; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. BRYAN moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to bring in a bill fixing the permanent salaries of those officers whose salaries were increased by an act passed on the second of March, 1799, &c.

Mr. J. CLAY inquired whether such a resolution was in order, a similar one having been decided upon before?

The SPEAKER said it was in order, as the former resolution was general, and this particular.

The resolution was agreed to—ayes 52, noes 43.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of Government, during the year one thousand eight hundred and four; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

TUESDAY, January 24.

An engrossed bill for the better direction of the collectors of the respective ports of the United States, in granting to seamen certificates of citizenship, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were referred, on the sixteenth instant, the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act giving effect to the laws of the United States within the territories ceded to the United States, by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes," made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report respecting the levying new and more specific duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, prepared in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the twenty-first of February last; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the committee to whom was referred on the thirtieth instant, the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the Directors of the Columbian Library Company," reported that the committee had, according to order, had the said amendment under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their agreement to the same.

The House then proceeded to reconsider the said amendment of the Senate, at the Clerk's table; and, on the question that the House do concur with the committee in their agreement to the same, it was resolved in the affirmative.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating a letter from Governor Claiborne, in relation to the government of Louisiana, under contemplation of the Legislature.—The Message together with the letter of Governor Claiborne, were read.

Ordered, That the SPEAKER be requested to return to the President of the United States the letter from Governor Claiborne, aforesaid.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were yesterday referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and four, reported that the committee had had the said amendments under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their disagreement to the same.

The House then proceeded to reconsider the said amendments of the Senate at the Clerk's table: Whereupon, the question being taken that the House do concur with the Committee of Ways and Means in their disagreement to the same, it was resolved in the affirmative.

PUBLIC ROADS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill making provision for the application of the moneys appropriated for making public roads to the Ohio.

Mr. SMILIE moved the rising of the Committee, with a view to the postponement of the bill to the next session.

This motion was supported on the ground that the application of the money was premature, there being but about $800 in the Treasury, and that the designation of the route would occasion much discussion, which would interfere with the transaction of important business before the House.

It was opposed by Messrs. JACKSON, SAMUEL L. MITCHILL, HOLLAND, and LYON, who contended that considerable time would elapse before the necessary arrangements could be made for making the roads; previously to which, upon a calculation made on a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, $20,000 would be accumulated, and an annual sum accrue thereafter of about $10,000; and that the present was as eligible a period as could occur for designating the points of the roads to be laid out.

The Committee rose—ayes 70; when the question being for giving leave to the Committee to sit again,

Mr. R. GRISWOLD said he should vote for it. He was of opinion that sufficient information did not exist to designate the points of the routes, and that it could not be had without authorizing the appointment of Commissioners to explore the ground; for the purpose of modifying the bill, to effect this object alone, he should vote for leave being given to the Committee to sit again.

This motion was supported by Messrs. ROGER GRISWOLD, DENNIS, LYON, and HOLLAND, and opposed by Mr. SMILIE; and carried—yeas 72, nays 54, as follows:

On a motion made by Mr. EPPES that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to discontinue the office of Commissioner of Loans in the several States, and to provide for the future discharge of the duties at present assigned to that officer:

The House proceeded to consider the said motion at the Clerk's table: When, an adjournment was called for, and carried.

WEDNESDAY, January 25.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, accompanied with sundry documents and papers, which have been deposited in his office by the South Carolina and Virginia Yazoo Companies, in support of their claims to public lands, transmitted in pursuance of a resolution of the twenty-third instant; which was read, and, together with the said documents and papers, referred to Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. MORROW, Mr. DWIGHT, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. BRYAN.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the seventh instant, the report of a select committee on the memorials of Alexander Moultrie, of the State of South Carolina, in behalf of himself and others, and of the Virginia Yazoo Company, by William Cowan, their agent, be discharged from the consideration thereof, and that the said report and memorials be referred to the committee last appointed.

Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the thirteenth instant, the petition of George Mason, of the State of South Carolina, presented the 28th of January, 1803, made a report thereon; which was read, and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for the payment of such invalid pensioners as were placed on the list in the State of South Carolina, agreeably to the former resolves of Congress, who, by the regulations of that State, were entitled to pensions at the commencement of the present Government of the United States, and who have not since been paid the same.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the twenty-sixth ultimo, the memorial of the City Council of Washington, in the District of Columbia, have leave to report thereon, by bill, or bills, or otherwise.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee last mentioned, presented, according to order, a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. N., also, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill to lay out and open a new public road in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill fixing the salaries of those officers of Government whose salaries were increased by the act of the 2d of March, 1799; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. LATTIMORE, from the committee to whom were referred, on the twenty-fifth and twenty-eighth of November last, the petitions of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory of the United States, and of sundry residents and claimants of lands on the Alabama river, and on the east side of the river and bay of Mobile, in the said Mississippi Territory, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

LOUISIANA TERRITORY.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the amendments of the Senate to the bill giving effect to the laws of the United States in Louisiana.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, providing for a port of entry at Natchez.

On concurring with this part of the report, a debate of several hours ensued, on the expediency of constituting Natchez a port of entry; when, the question being taken, the Committee of the Whole voted a disagreement to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, only 33 members rising in favor of it. This decision is a virtual agreement to the amendment of the Senate, for constituting a port of entry at Natchez.

Having made progress in the amendments, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

DOMESTIC MANUFACTURES, &c.

Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHILL, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred on the eighth, fourteenth, nineteenth, and twenty-sixth ultimo, the petitions and memorial of sundry manufacturers of corks; of sundry manufacturers of coach and harness ware; of sundry calico printers and dyers; and of sundry manufacturers of paper within the United States; made a report thereon; which was read, as follows:

Report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on various memorials and petitions from citizens of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, praying for Legislative patronage to several domestic arts, trades, and manufactures.

During the first session of the seventh Congress petitions and memorials were presented to Congress from the manufacturers of gunpowder, of hats, of printing types, of brushes, and of stoneware. These were severally referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures. And upon them a distinct report was made by the same committee on the subject of hemp, in consequence of a memorial from certain citizens, praying an increase of duty on imported hemp and sail-duck. This was presented to the House on the 18th of February, 1802.

Afterward, during the same session, the memorials and petitions of various manufacturers of starch, paper, and umbrellas, referred by order of the House, were severally reported on. And this report was offered on the 8th of March, 1802.

The session then drawing toward a close, the reports on these petitions, together with the memorials of certain calico printers, cordwainers, and shoemakers, were, few of them, acted on, but were left with other unfinished business to be taken up at the succeeding session. The resolution of the House to this effect, passed on the 16th of April, 1802.

In the course of that succeeding session, a considerable number of the former petitions were renewed, or others presented for similar purposes; and to the former collection were added memorials from printers, comb-makers, gunsmiths, and cork-cutters. The report on this volume of memorials was made on the 21st of February, 1803.

A number of these memorials, or others of the like import, have been presented again during the present session. The cutters of corks, the makers of plated trappings for carriages and horses, the stainers of plain cotton goods, and, in short, the domestic tradesmen and artists of almost every other denomination, have applied to Congress to patronize their respective employments, and to increase their profits. The modes of favoring domestic manufactures by Governmental aid may be reduced to the following heads:

First. Encouragement by the exempting imported raw materials from imposts. Already has it been recommended to the House to encourage some of our domestic manufactures, by increasing the facility of introducing the raw materials which enter into them. And it was thought sufficient encouragement for the manufacture of wheat into flour, and of mill stones, that rough or unwrought burrs should be admitted free from duty. The like opinion was entertained concerning the encouragement of the brush manufacture, by advising that the bristles of swine should be admitted free. As our country is not known as yet to furnish pure antimony, the exemption of the regulus of that metal from impost, was thought a sufficient encouragement for the incipient type manufacture. The paper manufacture seemed to be sufficiently provided for, if rags were permitted to be brought into the country without being dutied. Though saltpetre and sulphur both abound in the United States, yet as their preparation is still in a backward state, it was thought that the manufacture of gunpowder would receive due patronage by exempting them both from the payment of impost on their importation from Italy and India. Some think indigo ought to come free; as also the bark of the cork tree.

Second. Encouragement by laying higher or prohibiting duties on manufactured articles imported. It has been urged that a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem on fur hats, brushes, stoneware, saddles, cannon ball, glass bottles, and glassware of all kinds; and fifty cents on umbrellas; three cents per pound on starch; and four cents on hair powder would have an operation favorable to the domestic enterprise of hatters, brushmakers, potters, saddlers, iron masters, glass, umbrella, and starch manufacturers.

In like manner, it has been considered by a former committee, that if five cents the pound was laid upon imported gunpowder; three cents per pound upon glue; two cents upon tarred cordage; two-and-a-half cents upon untarred cordage or yarns; on printed calicoes an additional duty of two and a half per cent.; on all plated ware, an additional duty of five per cent.; on soap, three cents the pound; on candles of tallow three cents the pound; on anchors, two cents per pound; on spikes or bolts of iron, two cents per pound; on cut, slitted or rolled iron, one cent per pound; on foreign pickled fish, one dollar the barrel; and on all dried fish, one dollar the quintal; there would be an adequate Governmental aid extended to the manufactures of gunpowder, glue, cordage, soap, and candles, anchors, spikes, slit iron, and to the cod fishery.

Thirdly. Encouragement by withholding drawback from articles of foreign manufacture exported again. This is done already in the case of loaf and refined sugar, and might easily be extended to other articles.

Fourthly. Encouragement by allowing drawback of duties paid on domestic manufactures equal to what was paid for the raw materials on their importation. This has generally been allowed on the exportation of sugar refined from foreign materials, and on rum distilled from foreign molasses, though under our present law neither is entitled to the drawback. It has been supposed that plain cottons which undergo the operation of staining and printing within the country might be permitted to receive drawback on exportation in the form of calicoes.

Fifthly. By direct bounties. This mode of encouragement has been thought to have been employed partially in the curing and exporting of codfish; and could be extended to other branches of business if sound policy required it.

From this view of the proceedings of Congress it will appear that much has been done already to encourage the domestic industry of our citizens.

That industry, under such aids as the Government by these means has given at a time when population is so rapidly increasing, has caused useful arts and manufactures to rise up and thrive in almost every part of the country; our works in wood, copper, hemp, leather, and iron, are already excellent and extensive. And if we do not excel in the manufacture of the finer articles of cotton, silk, wool, and the metals, we may felicitate ourselves that, by reason of the ease of gaining a subsistence and the high price of wages, our fellow-citizens born to happier destinies are not doomed to the wretchedness of a strict discipline in such manufactories.

Our citizens are distinguished for their ingenuity and skill, they have invented many expedients by machinery to shorten and cheapen labor. The machine for making wool and cotton cards, the machines for ginning cotton, the machines for cutting and heading nails, the machinery for elevating wheat, and for raising and stirring meal in mills, and the improvements in the manufactures of muskets, class with the most useful inventions with which the age has been adorned.

It is, perhaps, to be regretted by the petitioners that Congress is deprived of the power to encourage manufactures by imposing duties on certain domestic raw materials if exported; if this, however, had not been withheld by the Constitution, an export duty upon horns and bones of oxen and deer, might operate in favor of the comb, knife, lantern, &c., manufacture; and an export duty upon green myrtle wax, might favor the bleaching of that choice vegetable production and the formation of white candles from it; so, perhaps, the laying an export duty upon furs, would be a ready method of aiding the hat manufacture. Or, to take a stronger case, an export duty on provisions, by making bread, meal, and other articles of food, cheap at home, might be viewed by some of the petitioners as a capital method of lowering labor, and encouraging domestic manufactures. But none of this latter class of expedients is under the control of the Government.

The committee observe, in the Journals of the House, that on the 21st of February, 1803, a resolve was passed, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and lay before Congress a plan for levying new and more specific duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, so that the same shall, as near as may be, neither increase nor diminish the present revenue collected from imports. From this plan, lately presented to Congress, additional light has been thrown on this subject.

In the meantime it ought to be considered that there is great scope for agriculture, tillage, and rural employment in the United States. Agriculture is the great occupation which sets in motion all kinds of manufactures. It furnishes both the raw materials, and the articles of subsistence, to those who are engaged in manufacturing employments. The cultivation of the earth is, therefore, absolutely necessary to provide the ingredients for artisans to work upon, and the food for enabling them to live, while they are engaged in labor. This being the fact, the great question arises, whether we shall furnish raw materials and food to manufacturers in our own country, or in foreign lands?

Political economists will instantly see that the good of the revenue, and the happiness of the people, are best promoted by offering a part of our unwrought materials, and of our surplus provisions, to domestic manufacturers, and, at the same time, to export the other part of what we can spare, in exchange for the wrought productions of foreign manufactories.

In a country devoted to agriculture, the cluster of arts and trades which minister to its wants spring up, of course, and almost from necessity. The plainer, coarser, and more useful fabrics in wool, leather, iron, flax, cotton, and stone, are manufactured with tolerable skill; while the more fine, costly, and high wrought articles of those several kinds can be procured more conveniently from foreign parts. And while the country consumer pays for the former with one part of his spare produce, he barters away the other part to procure a proportion of the latter.

There may be some danger in refusing to admit the manufactures of foreign countries; for, by the adoption of such a measure, we should have no market abroad for our produce, and industry would lose one of its chief incentives at home.

In addition to the wise calculations and estimates of our predecessors in Congress, who devised the existing system of imposts, there may probably be something done. And the following plan appears to the committee as well adapted as anything that has occurred, to suit the wishes of the petitioners as far as seems reasonable, and as far as actual circumstances warrant:

Resolved, That rags of linen, cotton, woollen, and hempen cloths; bristles of swine; regulus of antimony; unwrought burr stones; saltpetre; and the bark of the cork tree, (which pay at present twelve-and-a-half per cent. ad valorem,) be admitted free of duties.

Resolved, That brushes and black bottles, (now paying twelve-and-a-half per cent.,) be henceforward charged with a duty of twenty-five per cent.

Resolved, That fur hats, and plated ware, (which now pay fifteen per cent.,) shall be raised to a duty of twenty per cent.

Resolved, That stoneware, window glass, and cannon ball, (which now pay fifteen per cent.,) be hereafter charged with a duty of twenty-five per cent.

Resolved, That foreign pickled and dried fish, (which now pay twelve-and-a-half per cent. ad valorem,) be subjected to a duty of $1 50 the barrel for the former, and of one hundred cents the quintal for the latter.

Resolved, That a duty of three cents the pound be laid upon starch, of four cents the pound upon hair powder, and four cents upon glue, on their importation, in lieu of the present duties of fifteen per cent. ad valorem.

Resolved, That printed calicoes, and gunpowder, (now paying twelve-and-a-half per cent.,) be henceforward charged with a duty of fifteen per cent.

Resolved, That tarred cordage and cables, (now paying 110 cents the cwt.,) be subjected to a duty of two cents the pound; and that untarred cordage, (now paying two hundred and twenty-five cents the cwt.,) be made to pay two-and-a-half cents the pound.

Resolved, That a duty of fifty cents a piece be laid upon umbrellas; of three cents per pound upon soap; of three cents the pound upon tallow candles; of two cents the pound upon anchors; of two-and-a-half cents upon spikes, and bolts of iron.

The report was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

THURSDAY, January 26.

A petition of William Dunbar, of the Mississippi Territory of the United States, was presented to the House and read, praying that the title to a certain lot of land containing about twenty-three acres, within the limits of the city of Natchez, which was granted by the Spanish Government, in consideration of services rendered by the petitioner, may be confirmed to him, in fee simple.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. LATTIMORE, Mr. ALSTON, Mr. STEDMAN, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. RANDOLPH, and Mr. HAMPTON; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

LOUISIANA TERRITORY.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, of the twenty fourth instant, to whom were referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act giving effect to the laws of the United States within the territories ceded to the United States, by the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their agreement to some, and their disagreement to others, of the said amendments.

The House then proceeded to consider the said report and amendments: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the first and thirteenth amendments.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the second, third, and fourth amendments.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the fifth amendment to the said bill, for striking out, in the eighth line of the third section, the words, "Natchez and."

The question was taken that the House do agree to the resolutions, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 40, as follows:

The House then proceeded in the farther consideration of the said amendments of the Senate: When an adjournment was called for, and carried.

FRIDAY, January 27.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed on the twenty-second of November last, who were directed by a resolution of this House, of the twenty-fourth of the same month, "to inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts providing for the sale of the public lands of the United States," made a farther report in part thereupon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act giving effect to the laws of the United States within the territories ceded to the United States by the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes:" Whereupon the House agreed to the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth amendments; and disagreed to the seventeenth amendment of the Senate to the said bill.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, of the twenty-third instant, on the petition of Samuel Corp, of the city and State of New York; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their agreement to the same. The House then proceeded to consider the said report; and so much as is contained in the last clause thereof, being twice read, in the words following, to wit: "That the request of the petitioner is reasonable, and that he ought to be relieved:" the question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House therein, and resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant thereto; and that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures do prepare and bring in the same.

MONDAY, January 30.

Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the 28th of November last, the petition of sundry citizens and inhabitants of the counties of Washington and Allegany, in the State of Pennsylvania, presented the 22d of March, 1796, and the memorial of sundry inhabitants of the four western counties of the said State of Pennsylvania, presented the 30th of January, 1798, made a report thereon; which was read and considered; whereupon, the petitioners and memorialists, respectively, had leave to withdraw their said petition and memorial, together with the documents accompanying the same.

Mr. DANA, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented, according to order, a bill for the relief of Samuel Corp; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate desire a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and four;" to which conference the Senate have appointed managers on their part.

The House proceeded to consider the foregoing message of the Senate: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do agree to the said conference; and that Messrs. J. RANDOLPH, R. GRISWOLD, and RODNEY, be appointed managers at the same, on the part of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee, of the twenty-sixth ultimo, on "the expediency of granting further time to the proprietors of military land warrants to obtain and locate the same; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several resolutions thereupon; which were twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follow:

1. Resolved, That further time ought to be given to claimants of military land warrants to obtain and locate the same.

2. Resolved, That further time ought to be given to the holders of military land warrants to locate the same.

3. Resolved, That all locations hereafter to be made, shall be on the unlocated parts of the fifty quarter townships and fractional parts of townships, appropriated for satisfying the claims of individuals for military services, by a law of the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Messrs. VAN HORNE, ARCHER, JOHN TRIGG, SAMMONS, and TENNEY, do prepare and bring in the same.

COMMISSIONER OF LOANS.

The House took into consideration the resolution of Mr. EPPES, for the appointment of a committee to bring in a bill for the discontinuance of the office of Commissioner of Loans in the several States.

Mr. EPPES observed, that after the discussion which this subject had already received, he should not think it necessary to trouble the House with any further remarks, but that he believed more evil and more inconvenience had been apprehended from this measure than it was calculated to produce. If the office of Commissioner of Loans shall be discontinued, it is not contemplated by the friends of this measure to make any change in the payment of the interest of the public debt—that will still be paid within the individual States—the only change that will take place will be this, that stock of the United States, instead of being transferred partly on the books of the Treasury, and partly on the books of the Commissioners of Loans, will be transferrable on the books of the Treasury only. He should confine his observations, therefore, to the right of Congress to regulate the transfer in the way proposed, and to the expediency of exercising this right. By the act passed on the 4th day of August 1790, making provision for the public debt, the then creditors of the United States were invited to come forward and exchange the certificates or evidence of their debt for other certificates. At this time no complete register of the debt of the United States existed, many of the outstanding certificates had never been liquidated at their specie value, and having been issued by various persons in various situations were liable to counterfeit and the public and individuals to imposition. In providing for the payment of the debt it was necessary for the Government to ascertain its amount. This could only be done by calling in the outstanding certificates for liquidation, and for register or exchange. To have compelled every holder of a public certificate in this extensive country, to have resorted to the seat of Government for the purpose of registering or exchanging his certificate, would have been oppressive and unjust. Hence it was found necessary to make provision for receiving the old and issuing the new certificates within the individual States. Under the old Confederation, persons, under the denomination of Commissioners of Loans, had been employed in the different States in borrowing money, and issuing what were called indents of interest. This establishment was adopted by the framers of this law, and as this Government had experienced the inconvenience of wanting a register of her debt, a new duty was assigned to Commissioners of Loans, and the register of the debt rendered perpetual, by confining transfer to certain Government books, partly under the care of these Commissioners, and partly under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury. By the 7th section of the act it is declared that "the stock which shall be created pursuant to this act shall be transferable only on the books of the Treasury, or of the said Commissioners respectively." This provision as to transfer, it was on a former occasion contended, was a part of the contract between the public and the individual, and ought to be considered as one of the conditions on which the public creditor came forward to exchange the evidence of his debt. So far, however, from being a contract between the public and the individual, it is certainly nothing more than an ordinary legislative limitation of the right which the individual before possessed as to transfer. Previous to the passing of this law, certificates were payable to bearer, and, like a bank note or other negotiable paper, were transferable from individual to individual by delivery. By this clause in the law the individual was deprived of this facility of transfer, and compelled, instead of transferring his stock by delivery, to go in person, or by power of attorney, to a particular place, and a particular book, to make his transfer. The Government secured, by this arrangement, a perpetual register of its debt. The individual gained nothing; and I cannot suppose that a provision which abridged considerably the right of the public creditor as to transfer could have been designed exclusively for his benefit. The regulation was evidently adopted for the public convenience, and intended principally to facilitate the different operations of the Government in the payment of her debt. That this limitation or transfer was designed solely for the convenience of the Government, and not for the benefit of the individual, is evident from the 10th section of the law. This section applies to persons who shall not come forward to subscribe to the new loan—

"Such of the creditors of the United States as may not subscribe to the said loan, shall nevertheless receive, during the year 1791, a rate per centum on the respective amounts of their respective demands, including interest to the last day of December next, equal to the interest payable to subscribing creditors, to be paid at the same times, at the same places, and by the same persons as is hereinbefore directed, concerning the interest on the stock which may be created in virtue of said proposed loan. But as some of the certificates now in circulation have not heretofore been liquidated to specie value, as most of them are greatly subject to counterfeit, and counterfeits have actually taken place in numerous instances, and as embarrassment and imposition might, for these reasons, attend the payment of interest on those certificates in their present form, it shall, therefore, be necessary to entitle the said creditors to this benefit of the said payment, that those of them who do not possess certificates issued by the Register of the Treasury, for the registered debt, should produce, previous to the first day of June next, their respective certificates, either at the Treasury of the United States, or to some one of the Commissioners to be appointed as aforesaid, to the end that the same may be cancelled, and other certificates issued in lieu thereof; which new certificates shall specify the specie amount of those in exchange for which they are given, and shall be otherwise of the like tenor with those heretofore issued by the said Register of the Treasury, for the said registered debt, and shall be transferable on the like principles with those directed to be issued on account of the subscriptions to the loan hereby proposed."

From this section it appears that individuals who did not come forward to subscribe to this loan, who had no share in this pretended contract, were nevertheless compelled to produce their certificates at the Treasury, or before some one of the Commissioners, to lose their right of transferring their certificates by delivery, to receive other certificates in exchange, transferable only on the Government books. Not for the benefit of the individual certainly, who merely exchanged his paper, but for the convenience of the Government, to whom it is always important to know its creditors.

In ordinary transactions between man and man, the mode of transferring a debt is not a part of the contract. A. gives his bond to B. The transfer of the bond is subject to the local regulations of the country where it is given, and, however these regulations may vary, it never has been or will be contended that they affect the original obligation of transfer. The regulation of transfer is a mere ordinary act of legislation—a legislative provision, therefore, as to transfer, is like every other legislative provision, subject to legislative change. It would be necessary, therefore, to show that the faith of the United States was pledged expressly, as to the transfer of her debt, or this regulation may certainly be varied as the public convenience shall direct. In the 21st section of the act, the faith of the United States is pledged for the payment of the principal and interest, according to the tenor of the certificates. I know of no part of the act in which the faith of the United States is pledged as to the transfer of the debt. The certificate is the evidence of debt against the public in the hands of the public creditors. If the public discharges its debt, agreeable to the tenor of the certificate, it complies with the whole of its obligation; the certificate does not include any obligation as to transfer, it only promises the payment of the principal and interest, nor is the faith of the United States pledged for more. While we make provision for paying the interest regularly, and for the discharge of the principal within the limited time, no charge of violated faith can be made against the Government.

The question, therefore, resolves itself, in my mind, into a mere question of expediency—when ever the interest of the public and of individuals shall come in contact, I shall be willing fairly to examine what is due to the public, and what is due to the individual. If the office of the Commissioner of Loans is discontinued, it will not affect the value of the stock in the hands of the public creditors, because, it is a fact which will not be denied, that stock on the books of the Treasury is as valuable as stock on the books of the Commissioners; it will not affect the facility or certainty with which the public creditor will receive his interest, because that will still be paid within the different States. It will add nothing to the expense of transfer; because it is contemplated to make it the duty of an officer, residing at the seat of Government, to make the transfer free from expense. It will produce no inconvenience to the individual but this—at present during fourteen days in each quarter no transfer can be made, as during that period the officers prepare the dividend books; if the office of Commissioner is abolished, the books will probably be closed against transfer during twenty-one or perhaps twenty-eight days in each quarter instead of fourteen.

The public will gain the advantage of having all the operations relating to the debt under the immediate control of the Secretary of the Treasury. The public will be released from the dangerous responsibility of officers who make heavy disbursements, and give but little security. The Commissioner of Loans disburses annually in Massachusetts $785,036; in Connecticut $113,484; in New York $770,150; in Pennsylvania $848,665; in South Carolina $188,618. Notwithstanding these heavy disbursements, no Commissioner gives security in a larger sum than $10,000. The disbursements in all the States except North Carolina and Delaware greatly exceed the sum for which the Commissioners give security. The public will gain further, as appears from the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, an annual saving of $20,000. The States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, will be released from this proportion, a tax from which they receive no earthly benefit, not even a Commissioner.

He hoped that gentlemen who were not decidedly of opinion, that the transfer of stock was a part of the contract with the public creditor, would suffer a bill to be brought in, and the provisions rendered as unexceptionable as possible; if, after the subject is placed in its best form, inconvenience to the public creditor shall still be apprehended, the bill may be finally rejected.

Mr. ELLIOT said he had voted on a former occasion in favor of concurring with the report of the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, who had declared it inexpedient to discontinue the offices of Commissioners of Loans. In so voting he did not mean to pledge himself for the ultimate vote he should give on this subject. Not having then maturely considered it, his judgment was not fully made up. He was then of opinion that Congress possessed the power of substituting such arrangements in lieu of the Commissioners of Loans as would afford an equal security to the rights of the public creditors; and he was then inclined to believe that such arrangements could be devised. From subsequent impressions, he was of opinion that the public creditor would, whether justly or not he would not say, consider the measure as invasive of his rights. Under this impression he considered the small saving contemplated by this measure as inadequate to the injury, real or imaginary, which it might do to that description of men. On examining the law, he was inclined to think that the public creditor had a right to give it such a construction as would make the mode of transfer prescribed a part of the contract. By the act of August, 1790, it is provided, that

“A Commissioner shall be appointed for each State, to reside therein, whose duty it shall be to superintend the subscriptions to the said loan; to open books for the same; to receive the certificates which shall be presented in payment thereof; to liquidate the specie value of such of them as shall not have been before liquidated; to issue the certificates above-mentioned in lieu thereof, according to the terms of each subscription; to enter in books to be by him kept for that purpose, credits to the respective subscribers to the said loan for the sums to which they shall be respectively entitled; to transfer the said credits upon the said books from time to time, as shall be requisite; to pay the interest thereupon as the same shall become due, and generally to observe and perform such directions and regulations as shall be prescribed to him by the Secretary of the Treasury, touching the execution of his office.”

It is not denied that the payment of interest within the several States is part of the contract between the public and the creditor. By the same section that provides for the payment of the interest, it is also enacted that the Commissioner of Loans shall transfer the credits on his books in such manner as shall be required by the creditor. Mr. E. said he never entertained the idea that Congress could act with propriety in abolishing these offices without establishing a substitute in their room, by which transfers might be made in the several States. This idea appeared now to be abandoned by the friends of the measure, and it is now contended that the stock need only be transferable at the seat of Government.

But the gentleman requires those not decidedly hostile to the measure, to suffer a bill to be brought in, whose details may perhaps be satisfactory. Mr. E. said, no bill could be introduced that would succeed in securing his vote, that did not provide for effecting transfers in the several States; and on mature reflection he perceived no way in which this important end could be accomplished.

It was said that this measure would be conducive to public economy. Mr. E. declared himself as much attached to public economy as any member on the floor. But when he viewed the subject in all its aspects, he feared this measure, if adopted, would expose the Government to the imputation of being penny-wise and pound-foolish. For these reasons he should give the resolution his negative.

Mr. J. CLAY regretted that he was not in the House when the honorable gentleman from Virginia had offered his remarks on the resolution before the House. It was not his purpose in rising to detain the House. After the ample manner in which this measure had been discussed on a former occasion, he considered it unnecessary other than briefly to assign the reasons which would govern him in passing his negative on the present motion. From the terms of the act of 1790, he considered the facility of transfer secured to the public creditor by the establishment of the loan office as one part of the contract with the United States. Viewing the subject in this light he did not think that Congress had the power to take this facility away without a violation of the public faith. The facility of transfer certainly added something to the value of the stock. When necessity urged its possessor to part with it, any delay in making the transfer must decrease its value. This point had in a former debate been so fully discussed, and this effect been made so conspicuously to appear, that he deemed it unnecessary to say a single word more upon it. Without referring to the circumstances under which the public debt was created, or to the provisions of the law which formed a part of the funding system, without saying that system was the offspring of folly or of fraud, or adverting to the infamous circumstances attending it, he considered it as the offspring of Congress, and that they were not at liberty to touch a hair of its head.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said if the question had been taken by a silent vote, he should not have risen; but as the yeas and nays were required, and the vote he was about to give might appear to be inconsistent with that which he had given on a former occasion, he would concisely state the reasons why he should vote against the resolution.

They were these—when the report of the Committee of Ways and Means came into the House, it was attempted to be sustained on the ground that the existence of the loan offices formed part of the compact between the creditors and the public, and that any modification of them would involve a violation of public faith. For this reason, because he was unwilling to affirm a doctrine so untenable, and because he then believed that a modification might be made that would be rather beneficial than hurtful to the creditor, he was opposed to the resolution; and he was happy to find the doctrine that the existence of those offices made a part of the contract was not sustained by the House, and the report was therefore on that ground negatived. When the discussion was on a former occasion prosecuted, Mr. R. said he found gentlemen, without reference to political opinion, from all quarters of the Union, deprecating the subversion of this establishment. In particular, he perceived those gentlemen that represented the largest stockholding States, peculiarly averse to it; among them were several members from Massachusetts, and his learned friend from New York. Many members from North Carolina were also averse to the abolition of these offices. Under these circumstance, he should vote against the resolution. Not because he considered the Legislature as not possessed of the power to do away this establishment; not because he did not believe the plan suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury would not be ultimately beneficial to the public creditors, but because gentlemen, with whom it was his pride and pleasure to act, thought differently. In such a case, he was willing, out of deference to them, and to that which at present appeared to be the public opinion, to give up the saving which might result from the proposed measure.

Mr. R. then read the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the resolution submitted to them on the subject; and stated that the right of the Government to abolish the loan offices being affirmed by a former vote of that House he was willing for the present to waive the exercise of it.

Mr. SMILIE declared his opinion on this subject unaltered. He never had considered the existence of the Commissioners as a part of the contract, and he had no idea that the public faith would be violated by doing them away.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, and the resolution rejected—yeas 52, nays 58, as follows:

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill supplementary to the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington. The first section of the bill made the incorporation perpetual.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH moved to limit its duration to five years from the end of the next session of Congress.

Mr. RODNEY supported, and Messrs. NICHOLSON, J. CLAY, and DENNIS, opposed the motion, which was agreed to—ayes 48, noes 32.

On motion of Mr. DENNIS, a section was introduced, declaring citizens competent witnesses in suits to which the corporation may be a party—when the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

JUDGE CHASE.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, in the name of the committee appointed to inquire into the conduct of Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, stated that documents had been received by them which occupied a considerable bulk, the printing of which would considerably assist their investigation, by rendering them more convenient for perusal. He added, that it would probably be necessary to print these papers for the information of the House, when the report of the committee was made. He therefore moved the vesting in them authority to cause to be printed such papers as they might conceive proper.

Mr. EUSTIS suggested a doubt of the propriety of printing detached papers, which might produce an improper impression upon the public mind.

Mr. NICHOLSON observed, that it would rest with the committee to preclude, if they saw fit, a publication of the papers, though printed, until the report should be made, and remarked that this was the course pursued by the committee of investigation.

The motion was then carried—ayes 59.

Mr. LEIB said, we had heard much lately about the independence of the judges; that it had been a theme within the walls of this House, and the subject of animated discussion without them. To the rational independence of the Judiciary, he professed himself a friend, and to evince his sincerity, he begged leave to submit to the consideration of the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law against the appointment of judges of the courts of the United States to other offices under the Government.

TUESDAY, January 31.

An engrossed bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia," was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act in relation to the Navy Pension Fund;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have reconsidered their first, thirteenth, and seventeenth amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act giving effect to the laws of the United States within the territories ceded to the United States by the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes;" and desire a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the said amendments; to which conference the Senate have appointed managers on their part.

The House proceeded to consider so much of the foregoing message of the Senate as desires a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill therein mentioned: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do agree to the said conference; and that Messrs. NICHOLSON, JOSEPH CLAY, SANDS, HASTINGS, and NEWTON, be appointed managers at the said conference, on the part of this House.

SALARIES OF CERTAIN OFFICERS.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the salary bill.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH moved to fix the salary of the Secretary of State at $5,000 per annum.

Mr. ELMER moved to fix it at $4,500.

On Mr. RANDOLPH's motion, the Committee divided—ayes 64, noes 22.

The salary of the Secretary of the Treasury was fixed at $5,000 by a like division.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH moved to fix the salary of the Secretary of War at $4,500.

Mr. ELMER moved to fix it at $4,000.

First motion carried—ayes 50, noes 33.

The salary of the Secretary of the Navy was fixed at $4,500—ayes 55.

The salaries of other officers were fixed in the same manner as by the act of 1799.

On fixing the salary of the Postmaster General, Mr. HOGG moved to fill the blank with $4,000.

Mr. VARNUM moved $3,500.

JANUARY, 1804.

Salaries of certain Officers.

H. OF R.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH moved $3,000, the sum fixed by the act of 1799.

Mr. LEIB moved $2,000.

The motion to fill the blank with $4,000 was lost—ayes 17.

MESSRS. VARNUM, GREGG, CLAIBORNE, and SOUTHARD, supported the motion to fill the blank with $3,500, on the ground that the duties of the Postmaster General had greatly increased within these few years.

Mr. ALSTON opposed the motion; which was agreed to—ayes 59, noes 46.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH moved to fix the salary of the Assistant Postmaster General at $1,700.

Mr. VARNUM moved $2,000.

The last motion having failed—ayes 35, noes 47—that of Mr. RANDOLPH prevailed.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill with the above-stated amendments.

On agreeing to the report of the Committee, so far as it went to fix the salary of the Secretary of State at $5,000, a desultory debate ensued, not so much on the proposed compensation, as on the mode in which the bill had progressed.

By MESSRS. CONRAD, GREGG, ELMER, and RODNEY, it was remarked that a bill similar in substance with this having failed, owing to the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, it was contrary to parliamentary usage to permit a similar bill to be introduced during the same session. They further expressed their opinion, that it would be most proper to postpone the subject until the next session, when the consideration of compensations generally might be more advantageously entered upon.

MESSRS. EUSTIS and SMILIE advocated the correctness of the form as well as principle of the bill, and asked if there was not an absolute necessity imposed upon the Legislature, in case bills making appropriations for the civil list or military establishment should be rejected, to re-originate bills having the same object?

The yeas and nays were taken on agreeing with the Committee in fixing the salary of the Secretary of State at $5,000, and carried—yeas 80, nays 31, as follows:

The remaining salaries were affirmed by the House, until they reached the allowance to the Postmaster General reported by the Committee, viz: $3,500, being $500 beyond the past allowance.

On agreeing to this sum, a debate ensued—MESSRS. VARNUM, ELLIOT, LYON, and HOLLAND, advocated, and MESSRS. HUGER, LUCAS, NICHOLSON, and EUSTIS, opposed its adoption. The question being taken, it passed in the negative—yeas 53, nays 66, as follows:

The blank was then filled with $3,000.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH offered a new section, limiting the duration of the bill to three years, and to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter. Carried—ayes 51, noes 45.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow—ayes 51, noes 47.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was recommended, on the twentieth instant, the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the captors of the Moorish armed ships Meshouda and Mirboba," made a report thereon: Whereupon the amendment of the Senate, together with the bill, were committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, February 1.

Mr. NICHOLSON remarked that, from information received from the Navy Department, it appeared to him that a modification of the subsisting arrangements for the distribution of the officers and seamen on board of national vessels laid up in ordinary, would be advantageous to the public service, while a retrenchment of about $30,000 a year could be probably made. With this view he moved the appointment of a committee to inquire into the expediency of amending the act providing for a Naval Peace Establishment.—Agreed to, and a committee, consisting of Messrs. NICHOLSON, SANDS, CUTTS, LOWNDES, and STANTON, appointed.

SALARIES OF CERTAIN OFFICERS.

An engrossed bill fixing the salaries of those officers of Government whose salaries were increased by the act of the 2d of March, 1799, was read the third time.

Mr. LEIB moved to postpone the bill to the first Monday in December next.

This motion was supported by Messrs. GREGG, LEIB, J. CLAY, ELLIOT, THATCHER, ELMER, and SLOAN; and opposed by Messrs. RODNEY, J. RANDOLPH, DAWSON, SMILIE, EUSTIS, FINDLEY, NICHOLSON, and HUGER.

The advocates of the motion assigned different reasons for the votes they contemplated giving. Some declared themselves hostile to the quantum of allowance, as too high; others considered the apportionment of compensation partial and unequal, and were of opinion that it would be best to defer the entire subject of compensations to the ensuing session, when it might be gone into generally, and a permanent salary given to each officer correspondent to the services rendered by him. But the principal grounds of opposition to the passage of the bill, and in favor of its postponement, were, 1st. The rejection of a bill that very session alleged to be substantially the same with that under consideration; and, 2d. The insufficient and disproportionate salary allowed by it to the Postmaster General.

It was declared to be unparliamentary, inconvenient and dangerous, to permit a measure, similar in substance to one previously rejected the same session, to be brought again before the House. To show that it was unparliamentary, sundry precedents were appealed to in the proceedings of the British Parliament, and the invariable practice of Congress was likewise urged; it was said to be inconvenient, from the great waste of time it produced, after a full discussion of any subject; and it was declared to be highly dangerous from the power which it gave a minority at the close of a session to avail themselves of the accidental absence of members, to carry a favorite measure, though opposed by the express sense of the majority at an early period of the session. It was contended that the present bill was substantially the same with that lately before the House, and lost, owing to the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. This was evident from the salaries allowed being precisely similar in both bills; and it was insisted that the limitation of the last bill to three years did not discriminate it from the preceding bill, inasmuch as its effects would be as permanent as those of the former, should it be renewed from time to time.

The insufficient and disproportionate salary allowed the Postmaster General was strenuously insisted upon as an argument for postponing the bill. The office, it was alleged, required eminent talents, which the present officer, by the discharge of its duties, had shown himself fully to possess. Since the year 1799, the duties of the Post Office Department had greatly increased, and called for a remuneration, in some degree, correspondent to them.

The opponents of the postponement avowed their impression—an impression sanctioned on a late occasion by a great majority of the House—that the salaries allowed by the bill were moderate, and in no instance more than an equitable compensation for services performed. They contended that great inconvenience would flow from postponing the making compensations to the Executive officers until the ensuing year, and that the effect of such omission would be the necessity of then passing laws retroactive in their operation, which would be to create a precedent of an alarming nature, that might lead a Legislature, which had lost the confidence of their constituents, to empty the public Treasury into the hands of their favorites as a remuneration for services, compensated at the time they were rendered, by a smaller and what was then considered a competent allowance.

They contended that this bill was not the same with the one previously before the House, as the one was limited to three years duration, and the other was permanent; and that this variation constituted a characteristic and marked difference. That, as to precedents, those referred to, in the proceedings of the British Parliament, were opposed by others, afforded by the same body, which justified not only the passage of the present bill, but which went farther, and would justify the passage of a bill the same with one previously rejected. That this bill had not, in point of fact, been rejected; the principle of it had been affirmed by large majorities of both Houses, and the only difference arose on the amendment of the Senate for making an addition to the salary of the Postmaster General. It was further contended that the precedents of the British Parliament did not apply to the proceedings of Congress, who were free to act for themselves, who, as they had adopted no written rule applicable to this case, were under no other restraints than those which flowed from their own convictions of the good or ill effects of particular modes of procedure.

Salaries of certain Officers.

In reply to the alleged incompetency of the compensation allowed the Postmaster General, it was admitted that the present officer had ably and faithfully discharged the duties of the department, but it was denied that his official duties were of the grade asserted. While they required respectable talents, they did not call for those great and rare qualifications essential to the able administration and superintendence of the other great departments of the Government.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the postponement, and passed in the negative—yeas 45, nays 72, as follows:

YEAS—Isaac Anderson, Simeon Baldwin, George Michael Bedinger, Silas Betton, Phannuel Bishop, William Chamberlin, Martin Chittenden, Clifton Claggett, Joseph Clay, Frederick Conrad, John Davenport, Thomas Dwight, James Elliot, Ebenezer Elmer, John Fowler, Andrew Gregg, Gaylord Griswold, Joseph Heister, William Helms, William Hoge, William Kennedy, Michael Leib, Joseph Lewis, junior, Thomas Lewis, Matthew Lyon, David Meriwether, Nahum Mitchell, Thomas Moore, Gideon Olin, Beriah Palmer, Jacob Richards, Erastus Root, Thomas Sammons, Ebenezer Seaver, James Sloan, Richard Stanford, William Stedman, John Stewart, Samuel Thatcher, David Thomas, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Isaac Van Horne, Marmaduke Williams, and Thomas Wynns.

And then the main question being taken that the said bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 57, nays 52, as follows:

Resolved, That the title be, "An act continuing, for a limited time, the salaries of the officers of Government therein mentioned."

Mr. EARLY moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That to witnesses summoned to attend any committee of this House, during the present session of Congress, there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of — per day for their attendance, and the further sum of — for every twenty miles' travelling. And that to any messenger, sent under an order of the House for the person of a witness, there be paid, from the same fund, the sum of — for every twenty miles' travelling.

The House proceeded to consider the said motion at the Clerk's table; when, an adjournment being called for, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 2.

The House took up the following resolution, moved by Mr. EARLY:

"Resolved, That, to witnesses summoned to attend any committee of this House, during the present session of Congress, there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of two dollars and fifty cents per day for their attendance, and at the rate of twelve and an half cents for every mile's travelling. And that, to any messenger sent under an order of the House for the person of a witness, there shall be paid, from the same fund, at the rate of three dollars for every twenty miles' travelling."

The sums in italic were left blank in Mr. EARLY's original motion, but were so fixed after an expression of considerable diversity of opinion; when the resolution, so amended, was agreed to—ayes 69.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in relation to the Navy pension fund," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, of the thirty-first ultimo, to whom was recommended the amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the captors of the Moorish armed ships Meshouda and Mirboha;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported to the House their agreement to the report.

The House then proceeded to consider the said report and amendment; whereupon, the House agreed to the said amendment of the Senate, with an amendment thereto, by adding the following words at the end of the first section:

"And that the further sum of seven hundred and thirty-eight dollars and twenty-five cents be, and the same hereby is, appropriated for defraying the expenses incurred for the said ship, whilst in possession of the captors."

Mr. J. CLAY observed, that, by looking over a printed paper on their tables, he perceived there were several articles on which the drawbacks allowed exceeded the duties. He therefore moved a resolution instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of discontinuing the allowance of drawback on spirits, gunpowder, soap, candles, and playing-cards of foreign manufacture, and of allowing, in the lieu of drawback, — per gallon on all spirits exported, both of foreign and domestic manufacture. The motion was agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, of the sixteenth of December last, to whom were referred the petition of John F. Randolph and Randolph McGillis, in behalf of themselves and others, together with a report of the Secretary of War, accompanied with sundry documents respecting claims against the United States for services of the militia of the State of Georgia; also, the report of a select committee thereon; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

FRIDAY, February 3.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House, to whom was committed, on the fifteenth of December last, the report of the committee on a petition of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Assistants of the city of Natchez, in the Mississippi Territory of the United States, be discharged from the consideration thereof; and that the said report and petition be referred to the committee appointed, on the twenty-sixth ultimo, on the petition of William Dunbar, of the said Mississippi Territory.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill, supplemental to the act, entitled "An act concerning the City of Washington; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Ordered, That Mr. GRAY be excused from serving on the committee appointed on the twenty-first of December last, "to inquire whether any, and if any, what description of claims against the United States are barred by the statutes of limitation, which in reason and justice ought to be provided for by law," and that Mr. MOTT be appointed on the said committee in his stead; also, that Mr. DAVENPORT be appointed on the same committee in the room of Mr. TALLMADGE, who has obtained leave of absence.

GEORGIA MILITIA CLAIMS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of John M. Randolph and Randolph McGillis, which is unfavorable to the prayer of the petitioners.

The petitioners claim their pay as militiamen, called out in the State of Georgia for the protection of that State against the Indians. They allege, that, being called out under the authority of the Government of the United States, the General Government is bound to compensate them and the other men called out for their services.

The Committee of Claims report that the petitioners are to look for compensation to the State of Georgia, who, by the articles of cession recently concluded, had agreed to receive one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, in full for all demands for military service.

Mr. EARLY.—Mr. Chairman, I cannot but be sensible of the difficulty which opposes itself to the present claim after an unfavorable report from the committee to which it was referred. And it is impossible not to discern that this difficulty is increased by the opinion of the Attorney General upon the construction of the articles of cession from Georgia to the United States. But as to that opinion, it may not be improper to observe, that so far as it applies to the case of the claimant, it is repelled by the positive certificate of two of the Georgia Commissioners, gentlemen of veracity and legal talents equal with himself. To give to the opinion, or rather the "private ideas and recollections" of that officer, the weight and authority which have been thereunto attached by the Committee of Claims, would be to adopt in practice a principle at war with the maxims of all free Governments, it would be to constitute the framer of an instrument the judge of its construction. This is the essence of despotism. But I apprehend that neither the principle laid down in that opinion nor the facts therein stated do bear upon the case; but that the facts do negatively prove that the claims now under discussion were not included in the compensation stipulated to Georgia in the articles of cession and agreement. The principles are, that the term "territory," as used in the instrument, meant not only the territory ceded, but that retained. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I cannot possibly comprehend what bearing this has upon the question before us, I must be excused if I leave the Attorney General in the undisturbed enjoyment of his premises and pursue the discussion. Another principle which he appears to consider as unquestionable, is only necessary to be stated to show that it proves as little to the purpose as the former. He says that the words in the cession which stipulate that the one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be paid to Georgia "as a consideration for the expenses which the said State had incurred in relation to the said territory," must, from the mere force of the terms, include all expenses which that State had incurred for past military defensive operations. Now, sir, as it has never been admitted that the claims at present under discussion did constitute an expense which had been incurred by the "State," and as it is only upon the establishment of that principle that a rejection can possibly be authorized, I humbly conceive that the Attorney General has assumed that which it was essentially incumbent upon him to prove. So much for his principles. The facts by him stated are, that the Commissioners of Georgia, by way of inducement to the stipulation for paying a certain sum of money as a consideration for the cession, represented that the State had a debt incurred for military defensive operations, "which the United States upon an application had unreasonably refused to allow." Now, sir, as neither part of this description can apply to the claims of individuals against the United States for services performed under the sanction of the General Government, and which so far from having been unreasonably refused allowance by that Government, had not at the date of the compact been even the subject of discussion in its counsels, that statement must necessarily have relation to some other debt. This other debt I will now unfold.

FEBRUARY, 1804.

Georgia Militia Claims.

So early as the year 1787 the State of Georgia, being sorely distressed by the violence of the Indians, passed a law directing the establishment of two regiments of troops to serve until a restoration of peace could be secured. But the enlistments not having been completed, in the following year a law was passed holding out additional inducement, and in the year 1789 the present Federal Constitution having gone into operation and the rights of peace and war thereby vested exclusively in the General Government, the Legislature of Georgia passed a law discharging the troops which had been enlisted, and declaring the rate of pay which they should receive. For this pay certificates were directed to be issued, and these certificates constitute a debt unredeemed to this day. [Mr. E. turned to the several laws above referred to and read from each extracts as proofs of his statement.] Here, Mr. Chairman, you have unfolded a debt, which, without the least violence to construction, fills up the description given in the articles of cession. Here are expenses incurred by the State totally distinct from and unconnected with the claims now under discussion. It is important also to observe, that every attempt made by the State of Georgia prior to the cession to dispose of her vacant territory, appears from the face of the acts to have been dictated by a view of discharging the public obligations to those troops. No less than three attempts at a disposition of her territory were made prior to the cession. The first was an offer to cede to the General Government, in 1788, provided Congress would pay the expenses which had then accrued in defending the frontiers, and would yield the wanted protection in future at their own expense. This was rejected. In the following year a law passed for disposing of a part of the territory to companies, notoriously with a view to raise money wherewith to meet the same engagements. This also failed, for causes which have been amply unfolded to the House on another occasion. The next attempt was in the year 1795, which, in the very title of the law, is expressed to be made to meet the particular engagements to the same soldiery. Of the result of this transaction the House is also possessed. The last attempt was by the articles of cession. Thus it appears that in no instance were the present claims ever thought of as a debt to be met by the State of Georgia out of the proceeds of her unlocated lands, but that the expenses incurred by, and the engagements made to the troops in the years 1787, 1788, and 1789, were uniformly the moving cause toward a disposition of her territory.

The Committee of Claims however, sir, notwithstanding they have throughout their report endeavored to rest upon the Attorney General the responsibility of the construction given to the cession, have at the same time erected a pillar of their own to support it, where they saw it must fall. They well perceived that all reasoning upon the subject was idle, unless one principle could be established; this they have boldly advanced to, and instead of proving have assumed as the groundwork of their whole superstructure. It is, that the State was bound in the first instance to compensate the soldiery, notwithstanding the ulterior responsibility of the General Government. From this they infer that the State had a right and by the cession did exercise the right of exonerating the latter Government. Now, Mr. Chairman, grant to the Committee their premises and there is an end to the question between us; their consequences must result. But, sir, I must supplicate their pardon if I refuse my assent to their position until my judgment is convinced. And I must be pardoned for saying that the reasoning to which they have resorted for the purpose of proving it, strikes my mind as the reverse of sound; that it proves too much to prove anything. It is, that the State Government is in the first instance liable, because the troops were called into the field by the State Executive. This reasoning, Mr. Chairman, would go to prove that in every instance in which militia have been called into the service of the General Government, the States from which they were draughted were in the first instance liable for their compensation, because, in every case which has taken place, they were called into the field by State Executives. The truth is, sir, that in every case the orders have issued from the Executive of the General Government to that of the State Government, and that orders have from the latter issued in consequence thereof, for making the requisite draughts; so that the troops engaged in service under the immediate directions of the State, but under the mediate directions of the United States. This was the course pursued in both the insurrections in the State of Pennsylvania; it was the course in the State of South Carolina in relation to Indian invasion, at the same period at which the services were performed in Georgia for which we are now claiming compensation. It was the same course the other day with the troops ordered down the Mississippi to occupy New Orleans and its dependency. In all these cases the troops were compensated by the General Government in the first instance. It never entered the heart of any man that the States from which the draughts were made, were in the first instance liable, and that resort must afterwards be had by the State Government against the United States. I have always been taught that precedents established principles, but it now seems that the Committee of Claims in the profoundness of their researches have discovered that by assuming premises, principles may be established in the face of an uniform current of precedents.

There are, Mr. Chairman, two modes marked out in the Constitution in which the militia may be called into service. The first is a case where from necessity the war attribute of sovereignty is left in the individual States. It is the case of invasion or such imminent danger thereof as will not admit of delay. The other mode is that of issuing orders from the Executive of the General, to the officers of the State governments. This is the usual method by which the militia of the States are drawn into the service of the United States. And it is of importance to observe here, that the act of Congress which was intended to give effect to the Constitutional powers of the General Government to "call forth the militia," authorizes the President "to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper." For, inasmuch as there can be no other difference in a military point of view, and for military purposes, between the Governor of a State and the next highest military officer, than the difference of rank, the one being first, the other second, in command, it must follow that if the militia are to resort for pay to the State Governments because their orders have passed through the Governor, they must also resort to the same source in case their orders should pass through the second or third in command; the principles upon which the committee found their reasoning apply equally to both cases. The soundness of conclusions drawn by the committee is, therefore, not merely questionable, but to me it appears not difficult to prove that the conclusions themselves are at war with the most obvious principles of justice.

I hold it, sir, accordant with the most common rules by which individuals are regulated in a state of society, that when service is performed, the party for whom it was performed is the only one responsible for the compensation. The rule applies with equal force to the case of Governments, who are moral agents. Happily, Mr. Chairman, there is no difficulty in ascertaining the party for whom the service was performed in the case under discussion. Fortunately for the States in general, it is made the Constitutional duty of the General Government to "protect each of them against invasion." And fortunately for the State of Georgia in the present instance, there is the recorded sanction of the Executive of the Union, couched in the following words—"If the information which you may receive, shall substantiate clearly any hostile designs of the Creeks against the frontiers of Georgia, you will be pleased to take the most effectual measures for the defence thereof, as may be in your power, and which the occasion may require." If, therefore, the principles and reasoning of the committee be correct it must follow that troops engaged in performing the Constitutional duty of the United States must resort for their compensation in the first place to the States. To premises leading to such conclusions, I will not, cannot yield assent.

Mr. Chairman, it is recollected that when this subject was under discussion at the last session of Congress, a distinction was taken between the situation of troops called into the field by order from the General Government, and those called out by the State Executive in virtue of authority given by the former. But sir, I humbly apprehend that such a distinction is one of words, and not of principles. And I must here profess to the honorable Committee of Claims my profound acknowledgment, for furnishing me with an idea, and a mode of phraseology most suited to my purpose. They, in their report have told the House that the "manner of exhibiting" the demand, assuredly cannot change its nature. Now, sir, I repeat, in nearly their own words, that the manner of calling out the troops, cannot change the nature of the service. It cannot change the United States service into State service. And indeed the Committee of Claims themselves have given us the strongest proofs, that with them the distinction had no weight. For of claims which have been so contradistinguished in the reports from the War Department, there were committed to them, both descriptions; but they draw no difference. Indeed, their principles would admit of none.

But, sir, if a difference in principle did exist between claims of the two kinds, it would prove nothing in the present case, because the difference does not here appear in fact; and I cannot but consider it as one of the unfortunate circumstances attendant upon our claims, that the epithet unauthorized, has, without foundation, been attached to them, because, as was supposed, they were founded upon services not specially ordered. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that they were not only authorized, but they were ordered, by the General Government. I beg leave to compare the tenor of the orders for draughting the militia in Georgia, with the orders issued in other cases, about which no difficulty ever occurred. The words used in the Georgia case are, "you will be pleased to take the most effectual measures for the defence thereof," &c. What are the words used in the orders issued to the Governors of four States, to march militia to quell the insurrection in the Western counties of Pennsylvania? "I have to request your Excellency," &c. The words are the same in every other instance in which militia have been ordered into the service of the United States. They are the same which were used for enlisting the one hundred horse and one hundred foot to serve upon the frontiers of Georgia, about whose compensation there never has, until the present moment, been any difficulty; they are the same under which several corps were raised in the same quarter, whose services have long since been remunerated.

Let us here pause for a moment, and view the extent to which we shall be led by adopting the report. Sir, the principles of that report, and the application therein made of those principles, lead to a conclusion from which, if I mistake not, every gentleman upon this floor will revolt. Sure I am, every State in the Union will reject it with horror. What, sir! has the great, the all-important right of peace and war been yielded up by the States to the General Government, and yet the States bound to compensate for war services? It is no reply to this conclusion to be told that the States are only liable in the first instance; for it is then completely within the power of the General Government, by withholding, to make them bear the burden altogether. And to that may be added, that the expenditure might frequently be of such magnitude as to create extreme oppression in the imposition of taxes, and, in some States, might produce general ruin and bankruptcy.

There is, Mr. Chairman, one other fact to which I deem it important to call the attention of the House, and it is the last with which I will trouble them. From a report made by a select committee upon this claim, at the last session, it is ascertained that the supplies furnished to these troops were paid for by the General Government. Now, sir, I wish some gentleman would undertake to answer the question, whether such payment was not an unequivocal acknowledgment of the validity of this claim as against the United States. To my mind there is nothing more clear. If the troops were in the service of Georgia, why did the United States supply them? Where is the instance of troops in the service of one Power, supplied by another? Sir, the General Government was not surprised into this payment. It was made long after the services were performed, and when all the circumstances were well known. This act was—it cannot be considered in any other light than, an acknowledgment that the service was performed under the United States. Such acknowledgment, sir, creates an assumption too, which would bind any individual in a court of justice. It is conclusive against the Government, and a refusal to abide by it, will prove a dishonorable abandonment of the common principles of justice, because there is wanting a power of enforcement.

Mr. Chairman, I will conclude these observations, by bringing home to the House a question before asked—for whom was the service performed? From him must be the debt. Between him and the soldier was the contract. By rejecting the present claims, you will impair that contract—you will violate the Constitution of your country. What right has this Government to turn over its creditors, without their consent, to any State for payment? And truly, sir, if these unfortunate troops are to depend for their compensation upon your performance of the articles of cession, in paying the money you have therein stipulated, you have already given them a woful specimen of the soundness of that dependence. For by that compact this Government was, within twelve months, to open a land office, for the purpose of raising as speedily as possible, the sum to be paid. Where is your land office, sir? Nearly two years have elapsed, and we find it no where but upon paper. The public faith is pledged for the demand of the claimants—their pay is their right. To refuse it longer will be to stamp upon the national character, a wound, which it will deserve to carry unhealed so long as it has existence.

Mr. J. C. SMITH observed that the Committee of Claims, in submitting to the House the reports then before them, had not been influenced by the magnitude of the sum claimed for services. The simple question considered by them, was whether compensation had, or had not been rendered for those services. The decision of this question depended on another question, whether from the nature of our Government, the State of Georgia was to be considered as, in the first instance, liable for the satisfaction of these claims. If this should be admitted, he thought the proper construction to be placed on the articles of cession was extremely plain. There are two ways in which the militia of a State may be called out by the Executive of the United States. The first is by a direct detachment of any portion of the militia. It was not necessary, in any instance, for the Government of the United States to call on the Executive of a State for this purpose. It was in their power directly to call into the public service a brigade or other division. This is one course, which may be pursued, and in this case it is admitted that the soldiers are soldiers of the United States, and that for their compensation they are to look to no other Government than that of the United States, in the first instance. The other course is that where a requisition is made by the General Government on the Executive of a State. What is the state of things in this case? It must be presumed that the citizens of a State, thus called into service, are to look to their own State for compensation in the first instance, though he admitted that the General Government was in the last resort responsible. They are to look, in the first instance, to the State Government, for this obvious reason: The Gov-error of a State is not amenable to the General Government; and he consequently cannot be punished for exceeding their orders. Is that Government then bound at all events to pay the expenses incurred in consequence of the orders of the State Executive, when they may be in direct violation of the orders of the General Government? It is a clear position then, that when the militia are called out by the Executive of a State they are to look to the State in the first instance. Application may be made to the General Government in the first instance, and if there shall have been no disobedience to its orders it may make payment; but, put the case of the orders of the General Government being disobeyed, will it be contended that it will be obliged to remunerate services rendered in opposition to its commands?

Contemplating the subject in this view, it must be admitted that the militia are in the first instance to look to the State Government, which may make a compromise with the General Government.

The second question is, what is the nature of the compromise made in this case? The articles of cession purport to be [Mr. SMITH here quoted the beginning of these articles.]

It may here be proper to premise that Georgia is the first State in the Union that has ever received a compensation for her territory transferred to the United States. That territory was acquired by the joint exertions and blood of the citizens of all the States. Under such circumstances it becomes necessary to inquire into the compensation stipulated to be given by the United States to the State of Georgia; a compensation not given for the land, but for expenses incurred by Georgia in relation to it. The Attorney General tells us that these expenses were incurred for the portion surrendered to the United States, as well as for the whole State.

It behooves the gentleman from Georgia to show the precise expenses incurred. Were this once proved it would remove all doubt. The Commissioners who formed the articles of cession, it may be presumed, had before them the whole materials; and it must be inferred that the claims now made were fully considered by them, and were, so far as they are just, included in the settlement. Mr. S. concluded his remarks by saying he felt no uncommon tenacity or zeal against the claims; but that he would be very willing to allow them in case it should be satisfactorily shown that they were not already compensated.

Mr. MERIWETHER and Mr. HOLLAND opposed the report, when a vote was passed against the claims—yeas 73, nays 28; when the House, on the motion of Mr. J. CLAY, postponed the further consideration of the subject till Monday next.

LOUISIANA TERRITORY.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the managers appointed to confer with the managers on the part of the Senate, on the amendments depending between the House to the bill giving effect to the laws of the United States in the Louisiana Territory, made a report, recommending an agreement to several of the amendments proposed by the Senate with amendments.

[One amendment proposed to the amendment of the Senate limits the registry of vessels to citizens of the United States, or to persons resident five years in Louisiana.]

Mr. LUCAS suggested the repugnance of this provision to the treaty, which appeared to him to require the admission of all the inhabitants of Louisiana, at the period of cession, to the same privileges. This opinion was concisely supported by Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL, and repelled by Mr. NICHOLSON.

Mr. VARNUM moved an amendment, destroying the limitation. This produced a point of order, viz: whether an amendment to the report of a committee of conference was in order.

The SPEAKER being called upon to decide, stated that his recollection supplied him with no precedents. He would wish, therefore, before he decided the point, to avail himself of the recollection of any gentlemen who was possessed of apposite facts. No gentleman rising, the SPEAKER said his mind was not exempt from doubt and embarrassment; but a decision being required, he determined the amendment in order.

Mr. NICHOLSON observed that the point appeared to be a new one, and he was far from having himself formed a decided opinion respecting it. With great deference to the decision of the Chair, in order to have the point settled, he appealed to the House.

The appeal being stated, the House adjourned, without taking a vote upon it.

MONDAY, February 6.

Mr. NEWTON from the committee appointed, on the eighteenth ultimo, presented a bill to prohibit the exaction of bail upon certain suits brought in the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be directed to consider whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary to be made in the "act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war," passed March third, one thousand eight hundred and three; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment, made a report.

The report recommends an agreement to all the amendments proposed by the Senate.

The House concurred in the report, excepting so far as regarded an amendment of the Senate appropriating $4,500 for paying the postage of letters received or forwarded by the adjutant and inspector, and on their disagreement to which they insisted.

Mr. JACKSON observed, that, it would be found by a recurrence to the journals, that a resolution had been offered for discontinuing the offices of Commissioners of Loans, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, who had reported a disagreement thereto. To this report the House, after a full discussion, had disagreed—yeas 58, nays 55. It would also be found that, on a subsequent day, a resolution had been offered for the appointment of a select committee to bring in a bill for the discontinuance of those officers. This resolution appeared to have been rejected—yeas 52, nays 58. It followed from this statement that the first decision had been made when there were one hundred and thirteen members present, while the last was made when there were but one hundred and ten members present. The use, Mr. J. said, which he meant to make of these facts, was this: that inasmuch as the House, by their first disagreement, had negatived the disagreement of the Committee of Ways and Means to the original resolution, that resolution must be considered as still before the House; which was, that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to bring in a bill; whereas the last vote had only decided that a select committee should not be appointed to bring in a bill. He therefore gave notice that he should, on Thursday next, call up the original resolution.

LOUISIANA TERRITORY.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of Friday, being the report of the committee of conference on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill for carrying into effect the laws of the United States in Louisiana.

The SPEAKER stated, that when the House had adjourned, an amendment had been offered to the report, which he had declared in order, and that an appeal had been made from his decision.

At the request of a member, the SPEAKER stated several precedents, considered by him to be in point; and declared that on mature reflection he was of opinion that the amendment was in order: on which Mr. NICHOLSON observed, that he had made the appeal in consequence of the doubts suggested by the Speaker; as they were removed, he would withdraw his motion.

The amendment of Mr. VARNUM was then stated, and after considerable verbal variation, was agreed to, in such a form as substantially to allow all the inhabitants of Louisiana on the 30th of April, on taking an oath of allegiance to the United States, and citizens, to obtain register for their vessels.

The motion was supported by Messrs. VARNUM, LUCAS, G. W. CAMPBELL, BEDINGER, SMILIE, DENNIS, SLOAN, and HOLLAND; and opposed by Messrs. NICHOLSON, DANA, and HASTINGS.

By the former it was contended, that according to the third article of the Convention with France the inhabitants of the ceded territory were to be admitted into the Union as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution; and that in the meantime they were to be maintained in the enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; that vessels were property, and that consequently the undisturbed right to all the immunities appurtenant to them attached to all the inhabitants at the period of cession; that the treaty admitted of no discrimination, embracing in its provisions all the inhabitants of the ceded territory. To allow one description of inhabitants, viz. those who had resided in the Territory for five years, according to the report of the committee of conference, to register their vessels, while those who had resided a shorter period were prohibited, would be in effect to invade the rights of the latter by giving the former exclusive privileges. The treaty being the supreme law of the land, it was insisted that Congress did not possess the right of violating it, and that should they make any distinction, in hostility to it, they would give the inhabitants of the ceded Territory just grounds of dissatisfaction, and might create a pretext on the part of the ceding Power to obstruct its execution. It was further observed that the distinction would sow the seeds of jealousy among the inhabitants of Louisiana, and disturb that tranquillity and content which it was the policy of the United States to cherish.

Mr. GREGG, during the course of the debate, declared himself so far friendly to the principle of the amendment, as to be in favor of extending the right to register vessels to citizens of the United States, Spanish subjects, and French citizens.

The opponents of the motion observed that the Constitution had authorized Congress to fix one uniform rule of naturalization, under which authority they had passed a law requiring five years' residence, previous to the naturalization of an alien; and that under the revenue laws of the United States none but citizens were permitted to register their vessels; to extend this right to all the inhabitants of Louisiana would be to give them an unjust and unconstitutional preference over the inhabitants of the United States who were not citizens. It was allowed that when the inhabitants of the ceded territory were admitted into the Union, they would be entitled to all the rights of citizens of the United States; but it was contended that until such admission, they must be viewed in the light of colonists, subject to the discretionary government of the United States. The proposed amendment was unjust, as it extended important privileges to the inhabitants of Louisiana denied by our laws to our own citizens. For, while a citizen could not naturalize a foreign bottom, this amendment would permit an inhabitant of Louisiana to naturalize his ships, which could be considered in no other light than foreign bottoms. It had been said that this provision ought to be extended to all the inhabitants of Louisiana because the treaty had so prescribed. To this it was replied, that were there no other reasons for rejecting the motion, this would be sufficient, as, if agreed to, it went to establish the principle that the President and Senate, in the exercise of the treaty-making power, could make as many foreigners citizens, as they pleased; and that on this ground alone, were there no other, it became Congress, and especially that House, to resist the adoption of a principle so fraught with danger.

To this last remark the advocates of the amendment answered that the treaty-making power was unquestionably under the Constitutional control of Congress, who might, or might not, carry a treaty into effect; but that, after having carried it generally into effect, as had been the case with the Louisiana Convention, it became the supreme law of the land, and a discretion ceased to exist in the Government to fulfil or violate it.

On agreeing to the amendment, the House divided—yeas 55, nays 48.

The remaining part of the report of the committee of conference was then agreed to without any division.

TUESDAY, February 7.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee to whom was committed, on the twenty-fifth of November last, the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to prescribe the mode in which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings, in each State, shall be authenticated, so as to take effect in every other State," reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee, presented a bill to amend the charter of Alexandria; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. EURIS, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill for reprinting the laws of the United States, and for the more extensive distribution of the same, reported an amendatory bill to provide for a more extensive distribution of the laws of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

On motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That, whenever any number of citizens of the United States, not less than forty, residing within the District of Columbia, shall present a petition to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, praying that a public road may be laid out within the said District, the said Court, if they think the same reasonable and proper, may authorize the laying out of such road, in such manner, and of such width, as to do as little injury as possible to the owner or owners of the land through which the same shall pass, and so as to promote the public convenience: And the Court shall direct the person appointed to lay out the same, to make a return of his proceedings therein, and shall cause notice to be given to the proprietors of the lands, over which the same shall be laid out, to appear before the Court, on the return thereof, to show cause, if any, he, she, or they have, why the Court should not confirm the said return: And if any objection be made thereto, the Court, on hearing the parties, may either reject or confirm the same; and, in case of a rejection thereof, may proceed to take such order as to the course of such road, as they may think proper; Provided, That no such road shall be made to run through any yard, garden, or orchard.

Resolved, That the Court shall cause an accurate description of such road to be made and recorded in the office of the clerk of the county in which the said road shall be established; the same shall thereafter be deemed and taken as a public road: And if any person shall alter, change, or obstruct the same, the person so altering, changing, or obstructing the same, shall be liable to a penalty, not exceeding fifty dollars, for every such offence.

Resolved, That the said Court shall have power to estimate the damages to which the proprietor or proprietors of the land, over which such road shall be established, is entitled, and the same shall be levied and paid to such proprietor or proprietors in the manner hereinafter provided.

Resolved, That the Court shall appoint an overseer or superintendent to make and keep in repair such road, and may allow such compensation therefor as they may think reasonable, and may, for incapacity, negligence, or other misconduct, remove such overseer or superintendent, and appoint another in his place, as often as may be necessary.

Resolved, That if such road shall be laid out within that part of the District which was formerly included within the limits of Prince George's county, in the State of Maryland, the whole expense of establishing and keeping in repair the same shall be assessed upon, and paid by, the City of Washington and that part of the county, without the limits of the city, which was included within the county aforesaid, in a proportion corresponding to the amount of assessable property within their respective limits. If such road be established in that part of the District formerly included within Montgomery county, in the State aforesaid, then the expenses aforesaid shall be defrayed in manner aforesaid by Georgetown, and that part of the county included within the limits of the last mentioned county, in proportion to the amount of the assessable property within their respective limits.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the twenty-fifth ultimo, the bill to lay out and open a new public road in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. VAN HORNE, from the committee appointed on the thirtieth ultimo, presented a bill granting further time for locating military land warrants, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. THOMAS, from the committee appointed on the eighteenth of October last, presented a bill further to alter and establish certain post roads, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

The House took up Mr. LEIB's motion for the appointment of a committee to bring in a bill to prohibit the appointment of Judges of the United States to other offices, and agreed to it—yeas 67.

PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts providing for the sale of the public lands of the United States.

The following resolution was before the Committee of the Whole on a former day:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, for the time being, be authorized to receive propositions of compromise and settlement from the several companies, or persons claiming public lands in the territory of the United States lying south of the State of Tennessee and west of the State of Georgia; and, finally, to adjust and settle the same in such manner as, in their opinion, will conduce to the interest of the United States."

An amendment, limiting the power of the Commissioners to the limits prescribed by the convention between the United States and Georgia, had been adopted in Committee of the Whole.

No records being kept of the proceedings in Committee of the Whole, a question arose how far the Committee had proceeded on the subject heretofore?

Mr. VARNUM suggested that the resolution, as amended, had been agreed to. This being denied by other gentlemen, the Committee proceeded to debate the resolution.

Mr. GREGG made a few observations against the resolution, and Messrs. NICHOLSON and JACKSON replied; when

Mr. ELLIOT observed that he was apprehensive the debate was perfectly out of order. Upon reflection, he was convinced, beyond a doubt, that the resolution, as amended, had already been adopted in Committee of the Whole.

This statement being confirmed by Mr. VARNUM and Mr. TENNEY,

The CHAIRMAN decided that it was not in order further to debate the merits of the resolution.

Mr. EUSTIS moved that the Committee rise and report the resolution to the House.

Mr. NICHOLSON, although in favor of the resolution, moved to reconsider it, in order to open the debate de novo.

Mr. ELLIOT inquired of the CHAIRMAN whether the motion to reconsider superseded the motion to rise and report?

The CHAIRMAN decided that it did not.

The Committee then rose and reported the resolution, as amended; when

Mr. HUGER moved that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed for a fortnight, in order to introduce an amendment placing the Virginia and South Carolina Yazoo Companies on the same footing with other claimants.

This motion was withdrawn on the suggestion of

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, who moved to recommit the resolution to a Committee of the Whole. After considerable debate, the motion was lost—yeas 50, nays 54.

The question recurring on the postponement, was, likewise, after debate, lost.

Mr. BRYAN moved to refer the subject to a select committee; lost—yeas 37, nays 59.

When the House adjourned without deciding on the resolution reported by the Committee.

WEDNESDAY, February 8.

Mr. J. C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of certain military pensioners in the State of South Carolina; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

A representation of Duncan McFarland, of the State of North Carolina, accompanied with sundry documents, was presented to the House, complaining of an undue election of SAMUEL D. PURVIANCE, the member returned to serve in this House for the district composed of the counties of Anson, Cumberland, Richmond, Robinson, Moore, and Montgomery, in the said State. The representation, with the papers accompanying it, was referred to the Committee of Elections.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred the report of the committee who were directed "to inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts providing for the sale of the public lands of the United States," made the second of December last; and, after some debate thereon, adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 9.

A memorial and petition of sundry citizens of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, and mariners of the United States, in the said city, was presented to the House and read, praying that a law may be passed to authorize the admission into the marine hospitals of the United States of seamen paying, and subject to payment of hospital money, at all times, and in all cases of disease, under such provisions and regulations as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to report thereon by bill or bills, or otherwise.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from their first amendment to the bill, entitled "An act giving effect to the laws of the United States within the territories ceded to the United States by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes," so far as to agree to the modification and amendment thereof proposed by the joint committee of conference; they disagree to the further amendment proposed by this House to so much of the said amendments as proposes to add a proviso to the end of the first section proposed by the Senate; and they do adhere to their said first amendment, as above amended. The Senate also so far recede from their thirteenth amendment to the said bill as to agree to the amendment and modification thereof proposed by the joint committee of conference.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution reported on the seventh instant, from the Committee of the whole House to whom was referred the report, in part, of the committee who were directed "to inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts providing for the sale of the public lands of the United States," made the second of December last; whereupon, the first resolution being again read, in the following words, to wit:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, for the time being, be authorized to receive propositions of compromise and settlement from the several companies or persons claiming public lands in the territory of the United States lying south of Tennessee and west of the State of Georgia, and finally to adjust and settle the same in such manner as, in their opinion, will conduce to the interests of the United States: Provided, That, in such settlement, the said Commissioners shall not exceed the limits prescribed by the convention with the State of Georgia:

A motion was made and seconded to amend the second resolution, by striking out therefrom the word "finally," next before the words "to adjust and settle the same," and by adding to the end of the resolution the following words: "and that the said Commissioners report to this House such settlement as they may make on this subject; which, when confirmed by Congress, shall be binding on all the claimants under such companies, and on the United States."

And on the question that the House do agree to the said amendment, it passed in the negative.

The SPEAKER then stated the question, that the House do agree to the said first resolution, as reported from the Committee of the whole House; and further debate arising thereon, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 10.

Mr. THOMAS laid on the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to join with such committee as the Senate may appoint on their part, to consider and report what business is necessary to be done by Congress in the present session, and when it may be expedient to close the same.

Ordered That Mr. BALDWIN be appointed of the Committee of Elections, in the room of Mr. GODDARD, who hath obtained leave of absence for the remainder of the session.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported on the seventh instant from the Committee of the Whole, to whom was referred the report, in part, of the committee who were directed "to inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts providing for the sale of the public lands of the United States," made in December last; and after some farther debate thereon, the question was taken that the House do agree to the first resolution, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, for the time being, be authorized to receive propositions of compromise and settlement from the several companies or persons claiming public lands in the territory of the United States lying south of the State of Tennessee and west of the State of Georgia; and finally to adjust and settle the same in such manner as, in their opinion, will conduce to the interests of the United States: Provided, That, in such settlement, the said Commissioners shall not exceed the limits prescribed by the convention with the State of Georgia.

On this resolution a long and interesting debate ensued on the circumstances attending the Yazoo speculation, and the consequences likely to ensue from the entire disallowance or compromise of the claims of individuals for compensation for lands purchased under the several acts of Georgia and ceded to the United States; when, about six o'clock, the question was taken by yeas and nays on the resolution, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 62, nays 56, as follows:

After motions to adjourn and postpone the subject were made and lost, and the proposition of an amendment of Mr. J. RANDOLPH so to modify the resolution as to inhibit all compensation for lands purchased under the act of Georgia of 1795 was declared not in order, the following resolution was carried:

Resolved, That the time limited by law for filing claims in the office of the Secretary of State ought to be extended to the first day of May next.

A motion was then made to refer the two resolutions to a select committee to bring in a bill, which was superseded by an adjournment until Monday.

MONDAY, February 13.

Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill in addition to "An act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill for the relief of certain military pensioners in the State of South Carolina. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resumed the consideration of the question depending on Friday last, at the time of adjournment, that the resolutions agreed to the same day by this House, on a report, in part, made on the second of December last, by the committee who were directed "to inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts providing for the sale of the public lands of the United States," be referred to a committee, with instruction to prepare and bring in a bill, or bills, pursuant thereto: Whereupon, the said question was taken, and resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That Messrs. NICHOLSON, MORROW, DWIGHT, BROWN, and BRYAN, be the said committee.

The House agreed to the modification of the amendments to the bill for carrying into effect the laws of the United States in Louisiana, as agreed to by the Senate.

Previously to the vote of agreement, Mr. NICHOLSON stated that by such agreement, all provision for registering vessels, whether owned by citizens of the United States or inhabitants of Louisiana, would be waived; and that that subject was before the Senate in another shape. The bill is consequently passed.

Mr. NICHOLSON presented a memorial signed by Thomas Tingey, Robert Brent, Thomas Herty, and Augustus B. Woodward, in behalf of themselves and others, subscribers and members of the association in the City of Washington, for the erection of a theatre, praying for an act of incorporation.

On the reference of this memorial the House divided—yeas 44, nays 51.

Mr. NICHOLSON made a report on the petition of Matthew Phelps, and others, styling themselves military adventurers, concluding with a resolution that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

Mr. LYON opposed, and Mr. NICHOLSON supported the resolution, which was agreed to by the House.

ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the charter of Alexandria.

An unsuccessful motion having been made to waive the ordinary reading of the bill, it was in part read, when Mr. LEIB moved that the Committee should rise, and ask leave to sit again.

He observed that as the bill had not been printed, it was difficult to understand it; from that part which he did understand, he was persuaded certain principles were sanctioned by it which it did not become Congress to countenance. Certain qualifications of electors as well as elected were required, which were improper. [Mr. L. particularly alluded to the requisition of freehold estate.]

Mr. EPES stated his understanding, from a respectable inhabitant of Alexandria, that the bill differed materially from the propositions agreed to by the citizens of that town.

After some remarks from Messrs. J. LEWIS, FINDLEY, SMILIE, and SOUTHARD, the rising of the Committee was agreed to.

PUBLIC ROADS.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, the House took up the bill making provision for the application of the money heretofore appropriated to the laying out and making public roads leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic to the Ohio river.

Mr. J. CLAY moved to postpone the bill to the 1st Monday of December. Lost—yeas 41, nays 40.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD moved so to amend the first section, as to vest the President with a general power to appoint three Commissioners to designate a route, to be reported to Congress, for their ultimate decision; which motion, after a short conversation, was agreed to by a considerable majority.

Mr. LYON offered a motion for empowering the President to designate the routes. Lost, without a division.

The Committee rose and reported the bill with several amendments, in which the House concurred, and ordered the bill to a third reading on Wednesday.

SAMUEL CORP.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Samuel Corp. The bill was reported to the House with an amendment; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House. On the question that the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed for a third reading, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 63, nays 40, as follows:

Ordered, That the said bill be read the third time to-morrow.

MARINE CORPS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the reduction of the Marine Corps.

The bill reduces the officers of the corps to one captain and twelve lieutenants, and empowers the President, at any future period, when in his opinion it may be necessary, to augment the number of officers so as not to exceed those at present authorized by law.

Mr. EPPES moved to strike out from the word next in the third line of the first section to the end of the section, and insert:

"The whole of the officers of the Marine Corps, except such as are at present in actual service in the Mediterranean, shall be, and the same are hereby, discharged from the service of the United States: Provided, however, That if the President of the United States shall deem it expedient to employ a greater naval force than is now in actual service, he shall be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint such additional officers as may be necessary for the additional vessels called into service."

Mr. LEIB said, it might be proper to state that the bill on the table was the same with that passed by the House the last session, and arrested by the Senate. It was then alleged to be improper to pass it, as the state of the country as to its foreign relations, was such as might require the aid of the whole military force in existence. That reason had ceased, and the bill was consequently reported to the House. The committee, who reported it, were of opinion that it was not the intention of Congress to reduce the corps entirely; they had supposed that the reduction contemplated by the bill might be made, and a sufficient number of marines still retained in service. They had considered a lieutenant colonel commandant unnecessary, as it would be found, by consulting the report of the Secretary of the Navy lately laid before the House, that not more than 112 marines were attached to this place; they had supposed a captain fully competent to this command, which embraced as large a number as was stationed in any other part of the United States. The bill contemplated the retaining one captain, to be stationed here, and twelve lieutenants, three of which were to be attached to the command of Norfolk, Philadelphia, and New York. At Philadelphia there was at present one captain with the command of only fifteen marines. There were likewise several lieutenants and one captain in the Mediterranean. According to the contemplation of the bill, there would be one lieutenant at Philadelphia, another at Norfolk, and another at New York; and for further service in the Mediterranean, leaving five at this place, which were considered as sufficient to relieve a returning squadron. It was, therefore, considered that twelve lieutenants would be amply sufficient, allowing the establishment of a Marine Corps to be necessary. Since the bill had been reported, a statement of the expenses of the corps had been laid before the House by the Secretary of the Navy. On looking at that statement, he was inclined to the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia, that the whole establishment ought to be done away. It would appear from it, that it was the most expensive military establishment existing in any country. It was so far beyond the ordinary expenses of the military, that, in his opinion, the Committee ought not to hesitate a moment about either reducing it, or incorporating it as part of the Army. The lieutenant colonel commandant received more than $3,000 a year. This extravagant sum, paid for the support of this officer, was a sufficient reason of itself for reducing that office. It appeared that he charged the United States for pay and subsistence, $1,722; for house-rent, under the denomination of quarters, $500; for fire-wood, $200; for forage, (the Committee will recollect that he is a marine officer,) $200. It also appeared that subaltern officers, charged exorbitant sums for fire-wood and forage; how forage could be used on board of ships he was yet to learn. It further appears that the colonel commandant had passing through his hands the annual sum of between sixty and seventy thousand dollars; and that, in his accounts, there remained to be accounted for a sum of near $13,000; that, for the present year, the unaccounted sum was $5,700; and, for the preceding years, $7,200—making in the aggregate, $12,924.

Considering the expense of this corps extravagant, and that if it were necessary it might be placed on a different footing, and that the marines required might be draughted from the regular military establishment, Mr. L. said, he should heartily give his assent to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. EUSTIS inquired how, if the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia should be adopted, those officers at present in the Mediterranean were to be relieved? It must be well known to the gentleman that one squadron went out before the other returned. As to the idea of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to take the requisite number of marines from the Army, it was not practicable. The ordinary soldiers were not enlisted for this kind of service; they were not qualified to discharge it. There was another and a stronger objection; there were not men in the Army to be found, who could be spared. For these reasons, he was of opinion that, if the bill were to pass, it would be better to keep it in its original shape.

Mr. NICHOLSON said, he was friendly to the bill for reducing the Marine Corps, but did not perceive the propriety of adopting the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia. He considered some few marine officers, under the direction of the President, to be necessary. If all the officers should be disbanded, there would remain privates, under the command of no officers, unless of the Secretary of the Navy. While we kept up our naval establishment in the Mediterranean, there appeared to him a necessity of having five or six officers in readiness to relieve those engaged in the service, for the present force must be relieved before it can return. For these reasons, he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. LYON expressed a similar sentiment.

Mr. EPPES rose to give the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EUSTIS) the explanation he asked. If the gentleman, were friendly to the principle of the amendment, it would be easy to obviate the difficulty he had started. In making the amendment, Mr. E. said he had been guided by the conviction that the Marine Corps, whatever duty they might have performed, had not rendered services equivalent to the expenses incurred in their establishment. The corps had been established in 1798, since which period they had cost the United States $353,573. There appeared to have been advanced, in 1798, $7,200; in 1799, $37,000; in 1800, $84,000; in 1801, $85,000; and in 1802, to the 30th June, $38,300—making in the aggregate $252,834. This sum appears to have been actually advanced to the lieutenant colonel commandant, before he had filed a single account or voucher, and on his individual responsibility. Any one who will examine the accounts will perceive that, throughout the whole list of expenses, a mode of adjustment is adopted which is calculated to prevent a fair adjustment of the accounts. It is impossible to ascertain what a particular officer has received, and to what he is entitled. I have made a statement, said Mr. E., as far as I have been able, of the sums received by the commandant.

[Mr. EPPES here specified the several items of charge made by the commandant.]

From which it appeared, he said, that he had received $9,170. It also appeared that, during part of the period covered by these accounts, he had received $480 for quarters. From this statement it followed that the commandant received within $400 as much as Brigadier General Wilkinson, whose salary was limited to $2,700, while Col. Burrows received $2,398.

He observed that he had not had an opportunity of investigating the other accounts in the statement; but he had seen enough of them to convince him that the corps ought to be reduced. He asked whether it were the interest of the United States to support this establishment at an enormous expense, when the adjustment of our differences in the Mediterranean had nearly rendered their services unnecessary in that sea? It was not, however, his intention to dwell on the subject. He was fully convinced the corps might be dispensed with, without any injury to the United States. For this purpose a law had passed

Congress, two years ago, and it was well understood that the continuance of the officers in the service arose solely from a mistake in wording it.

Mr. VARNUM said, if he understood the effect of the amendment, it went to reduce the officers and not the men; it would, therefore, leave the men without any person to command them. This, he apprehended, would produce a state of chaos.

The question was then put on Mr. EPPES's amendment; which was negatived—ayes 45, noes 50.

On motion of Mr. LEIB, the period from which the reduction is to take place was fixed to be the first of March.

When the Committee rose and reported the bill, which the House immediately took up and ordered to a third reading to-morrow—ayes 68.

TUESDAY, February 14.

Mr. ALSTON, one of the members for the State of North Carolina, presented to the House a copy of an act passed on the twenty-second of December last, by the Legislature of the said State, entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to perfect titles to lands reserved to this State by the cession act;" which was read and referred to Mr. ALSTON, Mr. HUGER, and Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, with leave to report thereon by bill, or bills, or otherwise.

An engrossed bill for the relief of certain military pensioners in the State of South Carolina was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to reduce the Marine Corps of the United States was read the third time; and on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 40, as follows:

An engrossed bill for the relief of Samuel Corp was read the third time, and passed.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to join with such committee as the Senate may appoint on their part, to consider and report what business is necessary to be done by Congress in the present session, and when it may be expedient to close the same.

Ordered, That Mr. THOMAS, Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHILL, and Mr. TENNEY, be appointed of the said committee, on the part of this House.

Mr. RODNEY observed that, a subject had some time been before Congress, in which the commercial world was considerably interested; he alluded to fixing the standard of weights and measures. Under an impression that this was a fit time to resume its consideration, he moved a resolution to instruct the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures to inquire into the expediency of fixing a standard of weights and measures.

Mr. LEIB suggested the propriety of referring the subject to a select committee, in which idea Mr. RODNEY acquiesced.

Mr. MITCHILL, after assigning a number of reasons which led him to be of opinion that Congress would not, during the present session, be enabled to arrive at any conclusive measures on the subject, moved to postpone the resolution until to-morrow.

In which, Mr. RODNEY acquiescing, the motion was ordered to lie until to-morrow.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The following motion, offered by Mr. BARD, was taken into consideration in Committee of the Whole:

"Resolved, That a tax of ten dollars be imposed on every slave imported into any part of the United States."

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, it was agreed to add after the words United States, "or their territories."

Mr. LOWNDES.—I will trespass but a very short time upon the attention of the House at this stage of the business, but as I have objections to the resolution, it may be proper that I should state them now. I will do so briefly, reserving to myself the privilege of giving my opinion more at length when the bill is before the House, should the resolution be adopted, and a bill brought in. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, to find that the conduct of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, in repealing its law prohibitory of the importation of negroes, has excited so much dissatisfaction and resentment as I find it has done with the far greater part of this House. If gentlemen will take a dispassionate review of the circumstances under which this repeal was made, I think this dissatisfaction and resentment will be removed, and I should indulge the hope that this contemplated tax will not be imposed. Antecedent to the adoption of the Constitution under which we now act, the Legislature of South Carolina passed an act prohibiting the importation of negroes from Africa, sanctioned by severe penalties. I speak from recollection, but I believe not less than the forfeiture of the negro and a hundred pounds sterling for each brought into the State, and this act has been continued in force until it was repealed by the Legislature at its last session. This long interdiction, I think, manifests, on the part of the Government of the State, a disinclination to the trade, and had we received the aid from Congress which was necessary to enforce the act, the repeal which is now complained of would never, in my opinion, have taken place. But, Mr. Speaker, the State was unable to enforce its laws. It had given up to the Government of the United States all revenues derived from foreign imposts, and was, therefore, necessarily divested of the means of preventing the introduction into the country from sea of whatever the excitements to gain might allure it into. The geographical situation of our country is not unknown. With navigable rivers running into the heart of it, it was impossible, with our means, to prevent our Eastern brethren, who, in some parts of the Union, in defiance of the authority of the General Government, have been engaged in this trade, from introducing them into the country. The law was completely evaded, and, for the last year or two, Africans were introduced into the country in numbers little short, I believe, of what they would have been had the trade been a legal one. Under these circumstances, sir, it appears to me to have been the duty of the Legislature to repeal the law, and remove from the eyes of the people the spectacle of its authority being daily violated.

I beg, sir, that, from what I have said, it may not be inferred that I am friendly to a continuation of the slave trade. So far from it that, without adverting to considerations by which I know other gentlemen are influenced, I think the period has passed when the interests of the country required, and her policy dictated, that an end should be put to it. I wish the time had arrived when Congress could legislate conclusively upon the subject. I should then have the satisfaction of uniting with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who moved the resolution. Whenever it does arrive, should I then have a seat in this House, I will assure him I will cordially support him in obtaining his object. But, Mr. Speaker, I cannot vote for this resolution, because I am sure it is not calculated to promote the object which it has in view. I am convinced that the tax of ten dollars will not prevent the introduction into the country of a single slave. Gentlemen must be sensible of the truth of this observation, when they are informed, and the fact is too notorious even to be doubted, that, notwithstanding the expense and risk which attend an illicit trade, they have been introduced in very great numbers. Was I friendly to the trade, I should, without any hesitation, embrace the proposition contained in the resolution, and I should consider it a point gained of no small importance, that the Legislature of the General Government had given a sanction to it—for I can regard the Government deriving a revenue from it in no other light than a sanction. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, and those who think with him, ought, above all others, to deprecate the passing of this resolution. It appears to me to be directly calculated to defeat their own object—to give to what they wish to discountenance a legislative sanction; and, further, an interest to the Government in permitting this trade after the period when it might constitutionally terminate it. When I say that I am myself unfriendly to it, I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to be misunderstood; I do not mean to convey the idea that the people of the Southern States are universally opposed to it—I know the fact to be otherwise. Many of the people in the Southern States feel an interest in it, and will yield it with reluctance. Their interest will be strengthened by the immense accession of territory to the United States by the cession of Louisiana. Gentlemen cannot foresee what the situation of the country will be when the period arrives when Congress may constitutionally interdict the trade. The finances of the country, and the exigencies of the times, may be such as to prevent the Government, from dispensing with any part of its revenue. The tax, if imposed, will undoubtedly produce a revenue, and in proportion to the amount of this revenue will be the interest of the Government in the trade. But, Mr. Speaker, my greatest objection to this tax is, that it will fall exclusively upon the agriculture of the State of which I am one of the Representatives. However odious it may be to some gentlemen, and however desirous they may be of discountenancing it, I think it must be evident that this tax will not effect their object; that it will not be a discouragement to the trade, nor will the introduction of a single African into the country be prevented. The only result will be, that it will produce a revenue to the Government. I trust that no gentleman is desirous of establishing this tax with a view to revenue. The State of South Carolina contributes as largely to the revenue of the United States, for its population and wealth, as any State in the Union. To impose a tax falling exclusively on her agriculture would be the height of injustice, and I hope that the Representatives of the landed interest of the nation will resist every measure, however general in its appearance, a tendency of which is to lay a partial and unequal tax on agriculture.

Mr. BEDINGER observed, that the gentleman from South Carolina had so fully expressed the opinions he entertained, that he should say but little. Everybody who knew his opinions on slavery might think strange of the vote he should give against the resolution. There was not a member on the floor more inimical to slavery than he was, still he was of opinion that the effect of the present resolution, if adopted, would be injurious. He should, therefore vote against it.

Mr. BARD.—It was my wish that the question before the Committee might be taken without discussion, but, as the gentleman from South Carolina has preferred a different course, I beg permission to offer a few thoughts on the subject.

As to the constitutionality of the measure, I believe there can be but one opinion. It is pretty well understood that the union of the States was a matter of compromise; and, indeed, the language of the Constitution suggests the idea that the Convention which formed that instrument, must have had the emancipation of slaves under their consideration. They had achieved liberty, and their object was to transmit it to posterity; and we cannot permit ourselves to suppose that men whose minds were so enriched with liberal sentiments, and who had so often reiterated the sacred truth, "That all men were born equally free"—I say we cannot suppose that they would consider slavery to be a subject unworthy their discussion; and it appears to be equally suggested that the Convention were not all agreed to an absolute prohibition of the slave trade, but yielded so far that a duty or tax might be imposed on the future importation of that description of people. The question, then, is only on the policy of laying this tax; and it appears that there can be no doubt on this question.

The slave trade, in terms, makes African men mere articles of traffic, and of course they must be as much a subject of commercial regulation as any other species of foreign manufactures. The tax will be high or low, in proportion to the price the article will bring. And if my information is correct, a slave will bring four hundred dollars; the tax, then, is but two and a half per cent., which is many degrees lower than any other imported article pays. The tax is a general one; no State in the Union is exempted; it will operate wherever its object can be found. It may be that some States will pay more and some less, but it will be at the option of any State how much, or whether it will pay any of this tax; for it will be just as the State shall please to deal in this article of commerce. And, on the score of uniformity, no objection can lie against the tax—the slaves have already been the object of direct taxation, and Vermont paid none of that tax, because she had none of that kind of taxable property; and yet I never heard it complained of as not being uniform. It is said the tax is impolitic, because it will not prevent the importation of Africans into our country. This may, indeed, be the case; and I believe it will be but a feeble check to the trade if not aided by nobler motives. However, if any of the States engage in the trade, the tax will have two effects—it will add something to the revenue, and it will show to the world that the General Government are opposed to slavery, and willing to improve their power, as far as it will go, for preventing it. Both these ends are valuable; but I deem the latter to be the more important one, for we owe it indispensably to ourselves and to the world, whose eyes are on our Government, to maintain its republican character. Everything compared to a good name is "trash;" and it rests with us whether we will preserve or destroy it. If our Government will respect power only, and justify whatever it may be able to do, then will our hands be against every man, and every man's hand against us; and Americans will become the scorn of mankind.

On what principles, whether moral or political, I do not know; but so it was, that about the close of the Revolutionary war, the Quaker society in South Carolina brought the slave trade, or perhaps slavery itself, under their serious consideration, and declared it to be unjustifiable. They afterwards, in 1796 or 1797, addressed Congress on the subject; but failed in their object, and for no other reason, probably, than that the powers of Congress did not reach it.

Some years ago the States, even those in which slaves abound most, loudly exclaimed against the further importation of that class of people, and by their laws prohibited their traffic. Either they did this on moral principles or considerations of policy. In 1802, Congress stretched out her arm to aid the State Governments against the evil they so much deprecated, and passed a law inflicting fines and forfeitures on every man who should be found importing slaves into the United States. What might have been the issue of these combined exertions, or how far they might ultimately secure their end, I cannot tell; but, as to South Carolina, they have become nugatory; by repealing her prohibitory law she has rejected the interference of Congress. Why that State has done so; why she has abandoned a measure which, the other day, was considered so much her interest, I know not, nor is it for me to offer any conjectures. South Carolina is a sovereign State, and has a right to consult and pursue her own interest, so far as the general good will permit; for hitherto she may come, and no further. Every State has a right to import slaves if it so chooses, and Congress has a right to tax all the slaves imported; but when the powers of a State, though Constitutional, operate against the general interest, then the exercise of those powers are politically wrong, because it is contrary to the fundamental principle of society, the public good, which is paramount to law and the Constitution itself. And, in my opinion, the importation of slaves is hostile to the United States: to import slaves is to import enemies into our country; it is to import men who must be our natural enemies, if such there can be. Their circumstances, their barbarism, their reflections, their hopes and fears, render them an enemy of the worst description.

Gentlemen tell us, though I can hardly think them serious, that the people of this description can never systematize a rebellion. I will not mention facts, it is sufficient to say that experience speaks a different language—the rigor of the laws, and the impatience of the slaves, will mutually increase each other, until the artifices of the one are exhausted, and until, on the other hand, human nature sinks under its wrongs, or obtains the restoration of its rights. The negroes are in every family; they are waiting on every table; they are present on numerous occasions when the conversation turns on political subjects, and cannot fail to catch ideas that will excite discontentment with their condition. And what is to be expected from the people of this description, but that they will some day, and especially if their importation continues, produce a disturbance that may not be easily quieted, or kindle a flame that may not be readily extinguished. If ten thousand of them have been, as it is said, smuggled into the United States, in the course of a year or two past; and if ten or fifteen thousand of them may now be legally brought annually into our country, for four years to come, it will hardly be imagined that the general interest will be unaffected by such an importation.

If they are ignorant, they are, however, susceptible of instruction, and capable of becoming proficient in the art of war. To be convinced of this we have only to look at St. Domingo.

There the negroes felt their wrongs, and have avenged them; they learned the rights of man, and asserted them; they have wrested the power from their oppressors, and have become masters of the island. If they are unarmed, they may be armed; European Powers have armed the Indians against us, and why may they not arm the negroes? And if they are already as numerous as is consistent with safety, it must be extreme impolicy to import more; it is to accelerate an event which we cannot contemplate without pain.

Slavery is not only impolitic as it affects the strength and tranquillity of the United States, but as it prevents their wealth, which can only grow out of society where the arts, sciences, and manufactures, are cultivated and improved. But, sir, I despise to argue on the advantages or disadvantages of what is contrary to the genius of our Government; what is radically unjust, and violates the principles of morality.

The Americans boast of being the most enlightened people in the world—they certainly enjoy the greatest share of liberty, and understand the principles of rational government more generally than any other nation on earth. They have denounced tyranny and oppression; they have declared their country to be an asylum for the oppressed of all nations. But will foreigners concede this high character to us, when they examine our census and find that we hold a million of men in the most degraded slavery? This is nearly one-fifth of our whole population; in some of the States nearly the half. Here, then, is a fact that must have weight to sink our national character, in spite of volumes to support it. It is a fact, from which foreigners will infer, that we possess the principles of tyranny, but want the power to carry them into operation, except against the untutored and defenceless African. If, then, we hold a consistency of national character in any estimation, we will give every discouragement in our power to the importation of slaves. It is in this view that the tax contemplated by the resolution is principally to be considered, and only incidentally as matter of revenue.

FEBRUARY, 1804.

Importation of Slaves.

H. OF R.

But, sir, I presume, on permission, to say, that the importation of slaves is in direct contradiction to the principles of morality. On these principles the Constitution of the United States is founded; on them every law ought to be founded; otherwise legislation will progress in the dark, and every step deviate still more from its true direction. "Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you," is a law paramount to all human institutions; it is the fundamental law of human nature, of Christianity, and of every rational Government; it is a law which we wish all men to respect in their dealings with us; and it is a law which every man confesses he ought to observe, and, in spite of all the sophistry of depravity, must acknowledge himself subject to its cognizance. I need not, nor will I, ask if we have observed this law as to the Africans; for it must be obvious to every man that it is not possible to violate it in a greater degree than we have done towards that unfortunate and wretched people.

But, notwithstanding all the information our country enjoys, numbers in the Eastern States have been embarked, for some years past, in the cruel traffic of slaves, and smuggling them into other States. And it is to be feared that many of them are, at this moment, preparing means to stimulate the barbarous tribes of Africa to war against each other; mutually to torture every human feeling; to violate the strongest ties of nature and affection; to tear the husband from the wife, and the wife from the husband; the parent from the child, and the child from the parent; and are coolly and deliberately forging irons, that they may have the infernal pleasure of coolly and deliberately rivetting them on the unfortunate men, women, and children, who may fall into their hands. Such an enterprise, such a traffic as this, must affect our national character; it is self-evidently wrong, and, at first view, must receive the disapprobation of every disinterested man. The genius of our Constitution, the mildness of its administration, and the prevailing sentiment of the nation, must sanction every measure to discourage the further admission of a people whose numbers already excite most painful sensations. In a word, the tax is Constitutional; no article can bear a tax better than the one here proposed; it is an uniform tax, and justified on the ground of sound policy; and so far as it tends to discourage the slave-trade, it is supported by every principle of virtue. If I have uttered a word offensive to any member of the House, it will not be attributable to design, but to an honest solicitude to promote the honor and interest of our country.

Mr. BEDINGER said he differed widely, as to the effects of this motion, from the gentleman who had just spoken. He was as hostile to the slave-trade as any man in the Union; and if he could believe that the imposition of a tax of ten dollars upon every imported negro would check the importation, he would vote for it. But he believed the resolution would have a different effect, and would rather sanction than discourage the trade.

In point of revenue, the tax was of little consideration. Suppose a thousand slaves to be imported monthly, the amount of the tax would be about $100,000 a year; which, in four years, at the expiration of which Congress would have power to prohibit the trade altogether, would amount to $400,000—a sum too trifling to be put into competition with the adoption of any measure that went to sanction such a trade.

Mr. MACON (the Speaker) believed the resolution was not founded in good policy. All the declamation and appeal to the passions urged in its behalf appeared to him unnecessary and irrelevant. The avowed object of the proposed tax was to show the hostility of Congress to the principle of importing slaves. How would this opposition of Congress be manifested, when it would become the duty of the armed ships of the United States, as soon as the tax was imposed, to protect this trade, as well as all other trade on which taxes were laid? He asked whether vessels engaged in this trade would not, under such circumstances, possess the same right to the protection of the Government as any other vessels engaged in any other kind of trade? Can this House tax this trade, and refuse it the same protection that is extended to all other trade? The question is not whether we shall prohibit the slave trade, but simply whether we shall tax it. Gentlemen are of opinion that the State of South Carolina has done wrong in permitting the importation of slaves. Suppose that this is the case, May not this measure be wrong also? Will it not look like an attempt in the General Government to correct a State for the undisputed exercise of its Constitutional powers? It appeared to him to be something like putting a State to the ban of the empire. It will operate as a censure thrown on the State. To this, said Mr. M., I can never consent. As far as the law that may be founded upon this resolution can go, it will hold forth an evidence of the opinion entertained by Congress of the act of the Legislature of South Carolina. I know that these ideas may be unpopular in some parts of the Union, but I, notwithstanding, consider them just. There does not appear to me to be any necessity for our interposition, as, since the adoption of the Constitution, no slaves have, I believe, been permitted to be imported, and as only four years are yet to run before Congress will be possessed of the Constitutional right of prohibiting such importation altogether. And the simple question now is, whether, for a trifling revenue, we will undertake to protect this trade. My idea is, that those who at present go into the traffic, have no right to claim your protection; but once legalize it by taxing it, and they will acquire the right thereto, and will demand it. All that has been said on the circumstances connected with the slave trade, either here or in England, and on its morality or immorality, are in my opinion foreign to the true point involved in this debate, which is, Is the measure contemplated by the resolution politic, or is it not? In my opinion it is impolitic, for the reasons I have assigned, and for many others which might be added. I shall therefore, on this ground, vote against it.

MR. FINDLEY was of opinion that the policy of the measure embraced by the resolution, and nothing else, was before them. Gentlemen seemed all to unite in their abhorrence of the slave trade; they differed only about the means of preventing it. It was well understood that a large majority of the Federal Convention were inimical to the slave trade. That Convention had only acted upon it in a commercial point of view. As they considered imported slaves an article of commerce, the House possess the same liberty of acting with regard to them as with regard to other articles of trade. In some of these articles, Congress had the right of exercising unlimited taxation; in this case, their power was limited to a certain amount. Imported goods, on an average, were subjected to a duty of about 20 per cent. On this subject, a difference of opinion exists as to the propriety of making imported slaves an article of revenue. This is the true question, and not whether we shall cast a censure upon any particular State. It does not follow, that, because we lay a particular tax, we censure those who pay it. Considering this, then, as an article of trade, the tax might have been long since laid, had not all the States prohibited the traffic. Under those circumstances, it could not be taken up as a subject of revenue.

MR. F. observed, that, though it might be unbecoming in the House to be influenced by resentment against the State of South Carolina, yet it was proper that they should be influenced by the policy of the case. As a profitable article of commerce, it appeared as eligible a subject of taxation as could be found, and as justly liable to taxation as any other. As to the disgrace, which some gentlemen were of opinion would arise from taxing it, that arose from the existence of the slave trade. In laying the tax, we shall do all we can to discourage it; and if we do not like to use the money derived from taxing it in the common way, we may apply it to special objects—to ameliorate the state of slavery, or to any other object.

MR. F. concluded his remarks by observing, that this question being brought forward, he could not justify himself in neglecting to embrace the opportunity it presented of discountenancing the importation of slaves. He considered it proper that Congress should take up the subject as the Constitution presented it to them. At a certain period they would possess the right of prohibiting it altogether, and until then they enjoyed the power of taxation. This being the only Constitutional power they did possess, he trusted they would exert it.

MR. S. L. MITCHELL declared his wish that the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (MR. BARD) should be considered merely as a subject of political economy. In the remarks which he proposed to offer upon it, he should, therefore, confine himself to that object. He would, therefore, say nothing on the immorality of a trade which deprived a large portion of the human species of their rights. He should pass over, in silence, everything that might be urged to exhibit it as impious and irreligious; and he would not utter a word on its repugnance to the principles of our equal jurisprudence, and the spirit of our free Government. The slavery of a portion of our species was a copious theme, when viewed in either of these aspects; but, on the present occasion, he was willing to waive them all. The proposition was to be considered only in its commercial, economical, and fiscal relations; and on each of these it would be proper to make a few observations.

It was much to be regretted that the severe and pointed statute against the slave trade had been so little regarded. In defiance of its forbiddance and its penalties, it was well known that citizens and vessels of the United States were still engaged in that traffic. During the present session, memorials had been presented to Congress praying for exoneration from the exportation bonds, which had been given to one of the collectors of the customs, to insure the landing of a cargo of New England rum in Africa, which it was not pretended to be denied was bartered away for slaves. These voyages were said to be carried on under the flag of a foreign nation; and the common practice, as was alleged, was, to go to the island of St. Croix and procure Danish papers and colors. Under this cover, the voyages were performed. To prevent the confiscation of the vessels under the law, on conviction of being engaged in the slave trade, it had been customary to sell that article of property in a foreign port.

MR. M. observed that the extent of this shocking commerce was very considerable at this time. Some time ago, he had seen a list of the American vessels then known to be hovering on the coast of Guinea in quest of captive negroes. They were numerous and active, and so fatally busy as to excite the apprehensions of the benevolent Sierra Leone company. In various parts of the nation, outfits were made for slave-voyages, without secrecy, shame, or apprehension. The construction of the ships, the shackles for confining the wretched passengers, and all the dismal apparatus of cruelty, were attended to with the systematic coolness of an ordinary adventure. Regardless of legal prohibitions, these merciless men, as greedy as the sharks of the element on which they sailed, collected their slaves along the shores, and at the factories of Negroland, from the river Senegal to the countries of Congo and Angola. Countenanced by their fellow-citizens at home, who were as ready to buy as they themselves were to collect and to bring to market, they approached our Southern harbors and inlets, and clandestinely disembarked the sooty offspring of the Eastern, upon the ill fated soil of the Western hemisphere. In this way, it had been computed that, during the last twelve months, twenty thousand enslaved negroes had been transported from Guinea, and, by smuggling, added to the plantation stock of Georgia and South Carolina.

So little respect seems to have been paid to the existing prohibitory statute, that it may almost be considered as disregarded by common consent. And, therefore, as was observed by a gentleman from South Carolina, (MR. HUGER,) the Legislature of that State had lately repealed their restrictive law, and legitimated a trade which neither that regulation of their commonwealth, nor the concurrent authority of the nation, could prevent. And it may be received as a correct general idea on this subject, that the citizens of the navigating States bring negroes from Africa, and sell them to the inhabitants of those States which are more distinguished for their plantations.

Thus in spite of the spirit of our republican institutions, and the letter of our laws, a commerce in slaves is carried on to an alarming extent—a species of slavery peculiar in its form and character, and unlike that which was practised in ancient or modern Europe—a kind of servitude unheard of by the civilized world, until it was made known among the discoveries of the Portuguese along the western coast of that continent which reaches from Ceuta to the Cape of Good Hope. There it seems to have been extant from time immemorial, among the barbarous Powers of a country who have eradicated all the tender relations of society, and established in their place the forceful and ferocious distinctions of MASTER and SLAVE. From those rude and uncivilized tribes, did Christian people learn the lessons of negro slavery. Under such instructors, and with such examples before them, have the Europeans and their descendants carried those savage customs of the Africans into the New World, and most unfortunately tainted with them the manners and ordinances of a more refined race of men. For a delineation of this peculiar state of society, in its native regions, the world is much indebted to the undaunted enterprise of Mr. Parke; as, for its baneful effects upon the white nations who have adopted it, they will long remember the disclosures of Mr. Wilberforce, and the researches of Mr. Clarkson.

This doleful traffic it was not in the power of Congress to prevent by any present regulations. By the 9th section of the first article of the Constitution the power of admitting such persons as they please is reserved to the States, until the year 1808. South Carolina has authorized the importation of negro slaves from Africa. This Congress can neither prohibit nor punish. But the National Legislature can exercise the authority granted by the same paragraph of the Constitution, “of imposing on such importation a tax or duty not exceeding ten dollars for each person.”

There could be no doubt of the power of Congress to declare and levy such an impost on imported slaves for four years to come. The only question therefore was, whether it would be good policy to do so? Mr. MITCHELL contended that it would. On this point, he replied to a gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES,) who had argued that such a tax would discourage agriculture. He contrasted the cultivation of lands by the labor of freemen, with the more expensive management of them by slaves. He compared the husbandry of the Northern and Middle States, with the rural economy of the South. He examined in detail the moderate profits of a plantation on which bread, corn, grass, and live stock, were raised, and the enormous income derived to the proprietor of an estate employed in the culture of tobacco, rice, cotton, and sugar. He examined the smaller expense of feeding, clothing, and housing laborers in warm than in cold climates. It has been computed by men of observation, that a working slave on a cotton plantation would, besides supporting himself, clear for his master a net sum of two hundred dollars a year. On the average course of crops, where the plants were not attacked by the cherille, this estimate was considerably below the mark. And on this conviction he believed there was no important article whatever that would bear an impost so well.

Mr. M. then replied to an argument of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON,) that the imposition of the tax would be a recognition of the right to trade in slaves, and bind the nation to protect it with the force of the Navy. He considered slavery already recognised in many of the States, and permitted by the Constitution. It was a fact that it did exist, and Congress could not put an end to it. But this body might interpose its authority, and discountenance it as far as possible; and by laying the duty as high as the Constitution permitted, a very desirable addition would be made to the revenue. Two hundred thousand dollars might be computed to be derived from this sort of merchandise imported into the country. Nor would Congress be bound to protect the African commerce on the high seas; the existing statute would be in force against it; the trade would still be unlawful as far as the power of Congress extended. And under the proposition now under debate, this species of traffic would be so far from receiving encouragement, that it would be punished in cases where Congress could punish it, and taxed in the cases to which the power to punish it did not extend.

He then delineated the wretched condition of a man subdued by fraud or force, deprived of the exercise of his will and judgment, subjected to the dominion and caprice of another, robbed of his rights and privileges, divested of moral power and agency, degraded from the rank of a human being, and brutalized into a chattel—a thing—and divested of the character of a person. In this point of view, such articles, bought and sold publicly in the market, were to be considered as mere merchandise, as working machines, or animals of labor. Distressing as the reflection was to every sympathizing or patriotic heart, it was useless to dwell upon it, as it was beyond our reach to grant relief. He would therefore treat it strictly as a case of foreign merchandise heretofore admitted free, but upon which it was now intended to impose a duty. For his own part, he should be glad if it could be laid, ad valorem, upon the price of the article. But, as the matter was circumstanced, there was no other method that could be adopted than to impose it, per capita, upon the individual persons imported. By laying the tax, he would imitate the ways of Divine Providence, and endeavor to extract good out of evil.

Concluding thus that the tax was Constitutional, that the subject would bear it, and that it would be a seasonable and proper expression of the Congressional sentiment on the subject, Mr. M. proceeded to show what an abundance of excellent purposes could be answered by $200,000 collected annually for four years. We might then venture to unbar the door of the statute of limitation, which had been barricaded so firmly and so long, and pay off the balance of the claims demanded by the crowds of supplicating officers and soldiers who wrought out our Revolution, and whose only fault was that they had not presented their accounts within the prescribed time. We might make roads between the Western and Atlantic waters, and transport persons, goods, letters, and newspapers, with greater ease, cheapness and despatch. We might possibly prevent the necessity of new loans and expedients, on a call of emergency. We might afford more ample appropriations for completing the public buildings and streets in the Territory of Columbia, and particularly in the City of Washington; or, besides a variety of other works of public utility, missionaries might be sent forth to explore the new country which had been lately annexed to the United States, by tracing the Red river, the Arkansas, and others of the vast streams south of the Missouri to their sources, that we might thereby acquire a more enlarged and circumstantial account of the extent, boundaries, productions, and value of Louisiana.

In the course of his remarks, Mr. M. said, he had endeavored to avoid all harshness of expression on a topic of a peculiarly delicate nature, and prone to excite much sensibility in debate, but considered it strictly as a matter of political economy. In his attempt to state his reasoning to the Committee, not as an abstract speculator, but as a man of business, he hoped he had given no offence to any gentleman by any severity of animadversion. He looked upon negro slavery as a dark spot on some of the members of the national body, which was spreading wider, turning blacker, and threatening a gangrene all around—and he felt a confidence that all friends to the health of this body would take warning by its fatal progress in a neighboring island—which had so mortified in St. Domingo, as to make that extreme part rot and drop off from the system to which it once belonged.

Mr. SLOAN said he rose to observe, in a few words, that however afflicting it might be to contemplate a certain part of the creation used as articles of traffic, imported and exported the same as cattle, he did not consider the morality or immorality of the practice before the House. We must take the Constitution as we find it, and as it is not in our power to prohibit the importation, the only question to be considered is, whether we shall most encourage the traffic, by letting the articles imported remain free of duty or by imposing a tax upon them. This view, he believed, presented to the mind the true question, and believing himself that a tax would, in some degree, discourage the importation, he should vote for the resolution.

Mr. T. MOORE.—I am astonished to hear gentlemen, who advocate the resolution now under consideration, reprobate a traffic as horrid and infamous, and yet wish to draw a revenue from infamy, if it is an infamy.

I differ very widely in opinion from the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, who thinks that a tax of ten dollars per head will operate as a check to the growth of this horrid traffic. If I thought it would have that effect I would cheerfully vote for the resolution. I believe a tax of ten dollars will not prevent the importation of a single person of this description.

The gentleman told us that he hoped the General Government were disposed to discourage this traffic as far as they are authorized by the Constitution. I hope this House will discourage this impolitic act of the Legislature of one of the Southern States—not by imposing a tax on those unfortunate people imported into the United States, but by passing a resolution expressive of its disapprobation of all acts permitting the importation of certain people into the United States. As the General Government cannot prohibit this traffic before the year 1808, I hope this House will reject the resolution under consideration, and totally disapprove every measure which attempts to draw revenue from an act that rivets the chains of slavery on any of the human race.

I will not attempt to follow the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, who offered this resolution, through his book of lamentations, or through his chapter of horrid traffic, blood, murder, and treason, but will content myself with observing, that I flatter myself this House will never legalize an act by which our national coffers will be stained with the price of liberty.

The same gentleman says, he wishes the General Government to show that they are enemies to slavery. If that is the gentleman's wish, and it is in order, I will offer the following resolution as a substitute for the one under consideration:

Resolved, That this House receive with painful sensibility information that one of the Southern States, by a repeal of certain prohibitory laws, have permitted a traffic unjust in its nature, and highly impolitic in free Governments.

The CHAIRMAN declared this motion not in order while the previous motion of Mr. BARD was undecided upon.

Mr. HUGER regretted that he could not see the subject in the same light with other gentlemen who had taken a part in the debate. He had no hesitation in saying that he had always been hostile to the importation of slaves. Nor had he any hesitation in saying that if he had the power he would prohibit the importation. But the situation in which they were now placed was very different from that in which they would find themselves in the year 1808, when they would possess the Constitutional power to prohibit the introduction of slaves. The Constitution was known to be the offspring of concession and compromise, and in no part of it was this feature more apparent than in that which related to this subject. When the Southern States were admitted into the Union they were in the habit of carrying on this species of trade, and they, by the express language of the Constitution, retained the right of continuing it until the year 1808. Under this Constitution the State of South Carolina enjoyed the exclusive right of judging of the pro-propriety of allowing the trade or of prohibiting it. Had he had the honor of a seat in the Legislature of that State, Mr. H. certainly would have opposed the passage of this law. But he was only one of that community, standing here as their Representative, and after the State had exercised their undoubted right, however he might dislike the measure, it was his duty to defend the right which they had to adopt it. That State had in truth done no more than she possessed a Constitutional right to do, and he believed there was in that State as much true compassion as in any other in the Union. He said he could not therefore but feel sensibly the attempt to single out this particular State to censure her for doing that which she had an undisputed right to do.

This was not, as contended by some gentlemen, a mere question of revenue; but it was a question whether the Government of the Union should come forward and condemn the act of a State, which she was fully authorized to pass. If it is necessary to increase the revenue, let us meet that subject fairly and fully, and not single out a particular resource of a particular State. It is on this ground that I principally object to this measure. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHILL) has endeavored to prove that because in the Southern States the article of slaves produces a great profit, it is therefore proper to make it the subject of taxation. I ask if there should be a profitable species of trade carried on in any other part of the Union, it would be deemed politic or just on that account to lay an additional tax upon it? The fair principle of taxation is, that every part of the Union should contribute equally. When any branch of trade is profitable in New York, I, though a Southern man, rejoice at it. When the fisheries of the Eastern States prosper, I feel highly gratified—not because those whom I represent are particularly interested in them, but because I consider myself as a part of the whole, and that whatever advances the interests of any part of this Union must promote the interests of every part of it.

With regard to the moral principle involved in the slave trade, we have nothing to do with it. On this point the Union ought to be silent. On this subject can anything be more pointed than the provisions of the Constitution, which, contrary to most of the other provisions, cannot be altered but with the consent of every State in the Union. Why then shall we cry over what we cannot prevent, like a school-boy? Each State, so long as she confines herself within the limits of her Constitutional powers, must be the exclusive judge of her own conduct; and it becomes not one State, influenced by different feelings, habits, and interests, to pronounce upon the conduct of another. All, so far as regards themselves, are judges of right and wrong. We, too, have as strong a conviction of the propriety of our measures as those who differ from us in sentiment on this subject. We may perhaps think it more blameable to make slaves of white people than of the blacks.

I confess I have not been able clearly to understand the ideas of the gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHILL.) A few days since that gentleman offered a report, the object of which was to free raw materials from duty. Will the State of South Carolina profit by this? No. It will conduce to the benefit of other parts of the Union; but we shall bear the burden: and still, on this occasion, because we derive a certain profit from a particular description of trade, the gentleman contends for taxing it.

Let gentlemen also consider that we are not to be hurried away by our feelings or passions. We are sent here to attend to the business of the nation, and, to do that as it ought to be done, we must yield to a spirit of mutual deference and compromise, we must act fairly and impartially. All we ask in the present case is, to do as we would be done by. We permit the Eastern States to import German redemptioners and others. Let them then permit us to enjoy our Constitutional right of importing slaves, especially when that right will exist but for a short time.

We do not pretend to advocate the act, but the right of our State to pass this law. It is not to be inferred that we are friendly to the importation. I believe, on the contrary, every Representative of the State on this floor is hostile to it. But how can gentlemen expect that we will disregard the voice of our own State, and especially when the measure may have been dictated by good and substantial reasons. One good reason may be that the importation could not be prevented, and that the restraining law was extensively broken. This we know was the fact. If so, may it not have been sound policy in the State to repeal it? There may have been another reason for the measure. It may have been conceived to have been better to import slaves directly from Africa than to be indebted for them to New York and other States in which they may have been surreptitiously introduced.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHILL) observes that it is demonstrable that even in a pecuniary point of view, slaves are an evil; and that they impoverish those who hold them. What does this show, but that in the North they kept slaves as long as their interest dictated, and then got rid of them; and that because it is a misfortune to have them, we must be punished for our poverty. Though young, I am happy to state that I have seen the evil decreasing in the State I have the honor to represent. Let us alone, and we will pursue the best means the nature of the case admits of. Interfere and you will only increase the evil; for, whenever the Government of the Union interfere in the peculiar concerns of a State, it must excite jealousy and a spirit of resistance.

I beg gentlemen to lay aside, on this occasion, the prejudices to which local circumstances and peculiar State interests and feelings expose them. When I see the lowest of the animal tribe tortured, I feel for them; but does it follow that my interference will mitigate their pain? Do we not all know, that by interfering between a man and his wife, we only aggravate the difference; and do we not likewise know that any interference between a master and his slave induces the former to be more severe. I believe the State of South Carolina has as great an inclination as any State, similarly circumstanced, to do away this evil. But they must, and ought to take their own course. It is a circumstance well known, that the people to the North, who make the most noise on this subject, are those, who, when they go to the South, first hire, then buy, and last of all turn out the severest masters among us.

Mr. HOLLAND said he would trouble the House with a few observations on this subject. On the resolution before the committee, he considered it improper for the advocates to go so fully as they had gone, into the subject of slavery. All their remarks applied as forcibly to those who held as to those who imported slaves. He could not, for a moment, conceive it the intention of the mover of the resolution to throw out anything that would induce the slaves to rise against their masters. He ascribed his remarks to the zeal which he entertained to set all mankind upon an equal footing. Had the gentleman considered the real situation of the United States, and the situation of those who held slaves, it would have occurred to him that observations of this kind could answer no valuable purpose. What would probably be their effect upon masters and slaves? Might it not tend to make the slaves more refractory; might it not tend to make them rise and commit crimes too horrid to name? Mr. H. was certain this was not the intention of the mover.

Mr. H. said he would take the further liberty of observing, that such remarks did not apply to the real subject before the House. The only question was, whether it was expedient to lay a tax of ten dollars upon every slave imported into the United States. The only question was, as to the expediency of this measure. The morality or immorality of slavery were not to be considered at this time; they were to be laid entirely out of the question. It was not doubted that South Carolina had a Constitutional right to admit the importation of slaves; and it was not competent to that House to censure them for the exercise of a Constitutional right. Why, then, will gentlemen contend against the exercise of this right? In his opinion it was exceedingly improper.

As to the expediency of the measure, will it be of any advantage to the United States to lay this tax? Will they not by laying it pledge the United States to protect the trade? Is not the principle correct that taxation and protection are reciprocal? He had always understood this to be the case, and if it was, would not the General Government, by the imposition of this tax, pledge themselves to protect the trade? If then we are not prepared to protect the trade shall we undertake to draw revenue from it?

Gentlemen, however, allege that this tax, so far from protecting, will discourage the trade. But how does this appear? Are taxes laid in this way? No. Their object is to raise revenue, and all persons taxed are thereby entitled to the protection of the Government. If this law shall pass, the Government of the United States will derive part of their revenue from the slave trade. For this reason all those opposed to the traffic ought to pay no regard to the proceedings of the Legislature of South Carolina. Thus, in a short time, South Carolina may be induced to repeal the law. If, on the contrary, you raise a revenue from imported slaves, the citizens of that State may consider it right to go into the trade on an extensive scale. Mr. H. said he believed the greatest disapprobation would be shown by passing over the subject in silence, and by refusing to consider slaves as an article of taxation. The time would shortly arrive when Congress would possess the right of prohibiting the importation of slaves. He trusted, when it did arrive, they would make it a capital offence to import them, and thus prohibit the practice altogether.

Mr. LUCAS observed that, though much had been said on the merits of the resolution, he would take the liberty of adding a few remarks. It was a maxim that, to justify the raising of a revenue, a Government ought previously to stand in need of money. The pecuniary wants of a Government were absolute and relative. The fit objects of taxation were likewise various. Some objects bore taxation better than others. When Governments want money to satisfy indispensable demands, taxes must be laid; and even when they are not in immediate want of money for pressing emergencies, there are frequently important purposes that might be answered in case they possessed resources. On this occasion it is said that the Government is not in want of money, that the existing revenue meets the wants of the nation, and that, consequently, a new tax ought not to be laid. This may possibly, strictly speaking, be correct. But to say absolutely that we do not want money, he must deny; for he believed if they had money in the Treasury, not required for pressing exigencies, they could find abundant occasions for spending it to good effect. It was known that there were many claims preferred against the Government, of a meritorious kind, and which had been disallowed, not so much on their intrinsic merits, as from the operation of the statute of limitations. This limitation, said Mr. L., it is my wish should be removed, and one way of effecting that end will be to increase our revenue, as we shall thereby be enabled to discharge all just demands exhibited. The laying out, likewise, of roads was an important object. One is contemplated from this place to New Orleans. Without going further into a view of the various demands on the Government, we shall see the occasion that exists for more money being drawn into our Treasury.

As to the nature of the slave trade, we must, in my opinion, consider slaves imported as so much produce or merchandise. This article ought, in my opinion, likewise to be taxed, because the trade is odious; also, because it affords a great profit to those who carry it on. It was yesterday stated by a gentleman from New York that a slave employed in the Southern States would pay for himself in two years; that is, that a slave that costs four hundred dollars will give a profit to the owner of two hundred dollars a year. As, therefore, no article imported into the United States gives a greater profit, so no article can better bear a tax. It ought also to be taxed, because the importation of slaves into the United States operates injuriously on the poor whites who draw their subsistence from labor. Their comparative situation in relation to the rich, is reduced; for if you increase the black laborers, so as to make them work for a lower compensation, you virtually reduce the value of the labor of the whites, and proportionally lessen the chance of a poor white man getting employment on favorable terms. It is well understood that competition always reduces the price of an article in the market; and although the blacks may not, in all respects, enter into a competition with the whites, yet, so far as respects labor, the competition will be complete. The rich part of the community will not employ a white man who feels the spirit of a freeman, and who will not submit to be subservient to the caprices of his employer, so long as they can employ a slave whom they can control as they please, and at a smaller expense. The indisputable effect, therefore, of the introduction of additional slaves will be the reduction of the value of labor, and the augmented severity of the lot of the poor white man, who is entirely dependant on his labor for the support of himself and family.

Gentlemen tell us we ought not so closely to scrutinize the conduct of the Legislature of South Carolina. I am, said Mr. L., far from scrutinizing in this instance the conduct of that State. I respect the people of South Carolina. Their situation may, perhaps, be such as in a great measure to justify their conduct, though I am far from saying that I approve it. But when we lay a tax on the importation of slaves, it is a sufficient reply to such remarks to say that the tax is not laid exclusively on slaves admitted into South Carolina. It does not therefore apply to South Carolina alone. That State has an undoubted right to admit the importation; but Congress have also an undoubted right of taxing them. The resolution, therefore, does not encroach on the rights of that State. The United States and South Carolina form two bodies politic, both of which are possessed of Constitutional rights. To the one belongs the right of importing, to the other, the right of taxation; and this last right may be exercised without involving any censure of the State of South Carolina. The only necessary inquiry is, whether the proposed tax will be oppressive or unjust. I believe it will be universally agreed that an imported article worth four hundred dollars will not be taxed high compared with other articles, when it pays a duty of ten dollars. As to the constitutionality of the tax not a word need be said; that has not and cannot be disputed.

It cannot, I think, be justly said, by imposing this tax we single out the State of South Carolina with a view to punishing her. The mode of inflicting punishment is otherwise devised, as will appear by our statute books. They will show that when punishment is meant, it is by fines and penalties and not by taxes. The resolution does not, therefore, single out South Carolina; there is, in fact, not one word respecting South Carolina in it. It is not said the tax shall be laid upon slaves coming from Africa or going to South Carolina, but on slaves imported into the United States. If the tax shall operate more on South Carolina than on any other State, it will not be our fault. It will remain at her option at any moment to put herself into such a situation as to avoid it. The remedy is in her hands; she can when she pleases prohibit the importation of slaves, and the tax, so far as it falls on her, will immediately cease. And if other States admit the importation of slaves the tax will equally apply to them.

It is known that the thirst for gain is, at this time, more alive in this country than ever. This inordinate appetite, unless checked, may, in a few years, effect the introduction of one hundred thousand slaves. The opening in South Carolina will virtually amount to the same thing as if the importation of slaves were admitted into every State in the Union; for once introduced into one State, and they will soon find their way into the others where slavery is allowed. Wherever they go, the poor white man need not fix himself; for his labor and relative importance in society will be as nothing. If there be an importation of one hundred thousand, each being taxed ten dollars, the product will be one million of dollars, a handsome sum, by no means to be despised.

I do not, with some gentleman who have taken a part in this debate, believe that the imposition of the tax will legalize the trade, or that this Government will thereby countenance it. On the contrary, I draw a very different inference. The importation is not legalized by the Union, but by the act of South Carolina; and, legalized by her, it is out of our power to illegalize it. In laying this tax we are only exercising that power which the Constitution confers. Nor can the Constitution or our statute books be stained by Congress doing that which the Constitution itself empowers. Deeming the importation an evil, we shall, by laying this tax, do all in our power to diminish it, and, to the extent of our ability, extract the little good it is capable of producing. In making these remarks I am not the mere moralist, or the visionary speculatist. I consult the Constitution, and am governed by its language. As the Constitution acknowledges the right of the State to admit the importation of slaves, I also acknowledge it; and as the same Constitution vests us with the right of taxing them, I consider that also to be proper.

The Committee rose and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 15.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the thirteenth instant, the petition and memorial of sundry inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, subscribers and members of the association for the erection of a theatre in the said city, have leave to report thereon by bill, or bills, or otherwise.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee last mentioned presented a bill to incorporate the Washington Theatre Company; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed the thirteenth instant, presented a bill providing for the settlement of sundry claims to public lands lying south of the State of Tennessee; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

NAVY ACCOUNTS.

Mr. LEIB observed that an account of the most extraordinary nature had been recently laid before the House, by the Navy Department, respecting the expenses of the Marine Corps. It was indeed a phenomenon in accounts. It was of such a nature as required the interposition of the House, either to annihilate or reform the office of Accountant of the Navy. The statement was a species of nondescript never seen before in the United States. From it, it appeared that the public money had been expended in a most extravagant way, without any efficient check.

From it, it likewise appeared that the lieutenant colonel commandant has united in his person the offices of quartermaster, foragemaster, commissary, and paymaster, without check or control. There was a high necessity, Mr. LEIB said, when the Government was looking to economical reforms, to attempt some reform in this department of expenses. It was his opinion that the office of the Accountant of the Navy ought to be abolished, or, at any rate, some salutary reform effected. He, therefore, moved a resolution,

"That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the office of Accountant of the Navy; to report by bill or otherwise."

The House having taken up the resolution—

Mr. J. CLAY said that he had no objection to the passage of the resolution; but he would state, for the information of the House, that the Committee of Ways and Means had had the subject, together with that presented by an inquiry into the expediency of abolishing the office of the Accountant of the War Department, before them, for some weeks past.

Mr. LEIB replied that he was aware that the subject was generally before the Committee of Ways and Means; but the House had been in session four months without any report being made on it. His object was that this resolution should be passed as an instruction to the committee to pay a particular and early attention to the subject.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved to amend the motion by adding to it, "and the office of the Accountant of the War Department." His reason for this motion was that a bill to that effect was introduced into the House two years ago. Mr. N. added that he was of the opinion, that an infinitely better arrangement could be made at the Treasury if these offices were abolished than if they were retained.

Mr. LEIB acquiesced in the amendment.

The resolution, so amended, was then agreed to, yeas 61.

PUBLIC ROADS.

The bill making provision for the application of the money heretofore appropriated to the laying out and making public roads leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic to the Ohio river, was read the third time.

Mr. SMILIE moved its postponement to the first Monday in December, on the ground that the measure was premature, as the fund had not become sufficiently productive to justify the taking any immediate steps.

Mr. JACKSON supported the bill, on the ground, that Congress having pledged themselves to appropriate the money, there was an obligation imposed upon them to expedite the application of it, that the beneficial effects expected from it might be the sooner realized.

Mr. MORROW advocated the postponement till the next session. He was hostile to the present bill on account of the transfer of the power of designating the routes to Commissioners, under the direction of the President; under the belief that it would involve a great and useless expense.

After a few remarks from Mr. SLOAN, in favor of the bill, and from Mr. LYON in support of the postponement, the motion to postpone was negatived—yeas 38, nays 49. When the bill passed—yeas 60.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, the title was varied, so as to read "An act authorizing the appointment of Commissioners to explore the routes most eligible for certain roads," &c.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on Mr. BARD's resolution to impose a tax of ten dollars on every slave imported into the United States; the debate on which occupied the remainder of the sitting.

Mr. LUCAS supported, and Mr. HOLLAND opposed the resolution.

Mr. EARLE moved that the Committee rise and report progress. His reason for this motion was, that, from information received from South Carolina, on which he placed much reliance, it was expected that the Legislature would meet in April, and would then repeal the act admitting the importation of slaves. Should the Committee rise, he would move a postponement of the consideration of the resolution to the first Monday in May.

Mr. GREGG.—I hope the motion for the Committee to rise will prevail, and that any further proceeding on this subject will be postponed for the present. It has been said by the gentleman from South Carolina who made the motion, and I have heard it mentioned by others, that a considerable ferment has been excited in that State by the passage of the law authorizing the importation of slaves, and that it is highly probable the Legislature, at its next session, will repeal that law. That session, it is expected, will be held in April, the Governor having it in contemplation to convene the Legislature at that time for the purpose of submitting to their consideration the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

When this resolution was first proposed by my colleague, I felt pleased that it was brought forward, and considered its adoption as a necessary and proper measure; but, on mature reflection, I acknowledge I have very considerable doubts. I think the House had better pause, and weigh with deliberation the probable effects of the resolution, before they give it their final sanction. Irritated by such a resolution, South Carolina may continue the law, which, although very obnoxious in our view, she certainly had a Constitutional right to pass, and which, if undisturbed by any act of ours, she may, on cool reflection, and in conformity to the wishes of her own citizens, be induced to repeal. By precipitancy in the business we may possibly confirm the very act which it is our intention to destroy.

Let it not, Mr. Chairman, be inferred, from what I have said, that I am in principle opposed to the effect which I am confident the mover of the resolution expected it would produce. No member of this House is, or can be, more decidedly opposed to slavery than I am. In the State from which I come slavery is scarcely, if at all, known. I do not know whether, at this moment, it has any existence there. However the inhabitants of that State may differ on other points, on the subject of slavery we are all united. All parties have joined in abolishing it. I sincerely wish that Congress possessed a Constitutional power to abolish it, or at least to check its further progress in the United States. If they did possess such power, I would most cordially concur in putting it into operation. Instead of ten dollars, I wish the Constitution would warrant us in imposing a tax of one hundred, or of five hundred dollars on each imported slave. I would willingly vote for that sum, because it would amount to an entire prohibition of such importation, and effectually destroy the traffic, which I consider highly impolitic, as well as contrary to the principles of justice. But, admitting the resolution to be proper, the arguments by which it has been supported are, in my view, very exceptionable. The immorality of the slave trade has been insisted on at considerable length and with great zeal. This, to say no more of it, is certainly unnecessary in this House, because I am confident no gentleman on this floor will advocate the practice on the ground of morality. Why then so much pains to prove what we already believe? The conduct of the General Government, ever since the adoption of the present Constitution, affords sufficient evidence of the sentiment of Congress on this subject. Their records will prove that they have omitted no favorable opportunity of exerting their Constitutional power to suppress the trade.

But the argument founded on slaves being a fair article of commerce, warranted as such by the Constitution, and, of course, that a duty on their importation is a proper source of revenue, is still more extraordinary. I felt both surprised and hurt by this argument. I never expected to hear such a one advanced on this floor. Never, until now, did it occur to me that Congress would at any time think of deriving revenue from such a source. If money is wanting, I would submit to any tax—I would even agree once more to have recourse to a direct tax—rather than stain our Treasury by filling it with money collected from a duty on imported slaves. The imposition of such a tax certainly wears the appearance of giving countenance to the trade. However contrary to our intention, it will have the appearance, and so it will be construed by the importers. Sanction the trade by imposing the tax, and soon the traders will demand your protection.

When the present Constitution was adopted, there were no laws in several States to prohibit the importation of slaves. It is but a few years since such a law was passed by the State of Georgia. During all that period money was much wanted. The revenue was not adequate to the demand. Government was compelled to have recourse to loans, and in some instances had to submit to a heavy interest; yet in all that time the idea, I believe, was never suggested in Congress of supplying the deficiency by imposing a tax on slaves, although numbers were then imported. From this it may be inferred, that at that time the power vested in Congress by the Constitution of imposing a tax of ten dollars on each person imported into any of the then existing States, agreeably to its laws, was not considered as given for the purpose of raising revenue. It was given, it may be presumed, for the purpose of being used as a check to the trade, and at the time the Constitution was adopted, the exercise of that power might have contributed to produce such effect. The price of slaves was then low; their labor was not so productive to their owners, and, of course, ten dollars in addition to the then current price might, in some measure, have checked the spirit of purchasing. But soon after that period, by the introduction of the cultivation of cotton, the labor of slaves became more valuable, and their price enhanced in proportion. Ten dollars then bore some proportion to the price of a slave, but at this time it is comparatively as a cypher. A planter who can find his advantage in giving four hundred dollars, which is said to be the present current price of a good negro, will think but little of ten additional dollars. In the present state of things, therefore, I take it the proposed tax cannot effect the object contemplated by the mover of the resolution—it can neither prevent nor remedy the evil; and as it has the appearance of giving legal sanction to the trade, and may have an influence on the Legislature of South Carolina, inasmuch as it is an implied attack on their sovereignty, and a censure on them for passing an act which, however important it may be in our view, the Constitution certainly did authorize them to pass, I think the further consideration of the subject had better be postponed for the present; perhaps always, until Government may have it in its power to adopt measures calculated to produce an entire prohibition of the trade.

Mr. SMILIE regretted that a motion of postponement was made. He wished to meet the subject fairly, and to obtain the decision of the House directly. He well knew, from experience, that this was a favorite way of getting rid of a subject which gentlemen were indisposed to meet. So viewing the subject, he could not but feel surprise at the sentiments of his colleague.

H. OF R.

Importation of Slaves.

FEBRUARY, 1804.

It is urged that we have no right to intermeddle in the affairs of South Carolina, or to speak of the act of the Legislature. He allowed that they had no right, as a Legislative body, to censure the State of South Carolina for the exercise of a Constitutional power. They undoubtedly had a right to do what they have done. But at the same time the Legislature of the Union possesses as good a right to do what is now proposed to be done. This is a complete answer to the argument advanced against the resolution.

Mr. S. said he would wish to steer clear of the question of morality. But at the same time that he considered it prudent to avoid this discussion, he could not but think the interest of the Union involved in the measure pursued by South Carolina. It was but a short time since Congress had received a representation from that State expressing the great danger apprehended from slaves pouring into the country. It would be recollected how earnestly they had been pressed to pass a law to counteract this effect, which, in some of its provisions, was so exceptionable as not to be agreed to. When I recollect this circumstance, said Mr. S., I feel surprised that that State has again opened the importation of slaves. It is true that the importation from the West Indies is not opened. But this description of persons, though in the first instance brought from Africa, may, at a future day, be converted into as formidable enemies as the others.

This measure so far affects the interests of the Union, as it tends to weaken the common defence of the country, into which every slave that is admitted must be viewed in the light of an imported enemy. In this view, the act of the Legislature of South Carolina seriously affects the Union. For we know that in case of an insurrection in any one part of our country, the Union is bound to suppress it.

Mr. S. said he would notice a few other objections urged against this resolution. He would first declare, as to revenue, so far as the resolution was considered merely in that light, he was not its advocate; for he abhorred the idea of raising a revenue from a traffic in human beings; if it were considered in that light he should vote against it. But he viewed the subject on a larger scale. He considered its effect on national character.

Gentlemen say the tax will sanction the law of South Carolina. Such an argument he could not comprehend. He had ever understood that the laying a duty on any particular article of trade rendered it more difficult to carry that trade on. He knew the proposed tax was very small; but small as it was it would have some effect; it would, at all events, show that it was a trade not approved by the Legislature of the Union.

Mr. S. concluded by saying that, whether the resolution was expedient or not, it was before them, and they must express their sentiments upon it. He would ask, whether it would be for the reputation of the nation to reject it? As to the existence of slavery in some parts of the Union, they were not chargeable with it. It was out of their power to help it. But, on this occasion, some act was required of the House expressive of their disapprobation of the renewed importation of slaves.

Mr. LYON said he considered the resolution as giving a sanction to the trade; and he also considered the State of South Carolina as having, in the passage of the law admitting slaves, exercised the right of a sovereign State. He should, therefore, not vote for the resolution, but for the postponement.

Mr. HUGER said the arguments urged by the friends of the motion were two-fold. One class of gentlemen say they are not in favor of this tax for purposes of revenue, but to manifest the opinion of the National Legislature; while another class declares their only reason for laying it is the revenue it will bring into the Treasury. A decision, therefore, by the House, will settle no principle; for supposing that a majority of the members shall be found in favor of the tax, one-half of them will vote for it on one principle and one-half on another. Under these circumstances, he appealed to gentlemen inclined to favor the resolution, whether it would not be the best policy to wait until the Legislature of South Carolina had an opportunity of repealing the obnoxious law. Is it a pleasant thing to any gentleman on this floor to throw a stigma upon a State? And will not gentlemen from the Middle and Eastern States recollect that the situation of South Carolina is very different from that of their States? Let them, then, do as much good as they can at home; but let them, in God's name, permit us to act for ourselves. It is a very easy thing to make some harsh remarks on the conduct of particular States, even of the State of Pennsylvania, much as that State is deservedly respected. Mr. H. said he did not believe that State stood one iota higher than other States in the Union. For he believed that peculiar interest operated there as well as in other States.

Mr. H. said, from what had been expressed to-day, he did not believe the people of South Carolina friendly to the act admitting the importation of slaves. Every representative of that State on this floor wished, he believed, that it had never been passed. But as it had passed, they conceived it to be their duty to resist a measure which went to censure the State for the exercise of an undoubted right.

After making some further remarks, Mr. H. concluded by expressing his hope that the resolution would be postponed.

Mr. STANTON.—Mr. Speaker, I am highly gratified to find honorable members in every part of the House who reprobate the infamous traffic of buying and selling the human species. On this occasion but a few remarks are necessary, if morality, humanity, and justice, are conducive to the happiness of society. It is not my duty nor intention to criminate the State of South Carolina, whose late conduct has created serious and well founded alarm. It is a duty I owe to my constituents and myself not to connive at a measure that, in my humble opinion, goes to shake the pillars of public security, and threatens corruption to the morals of our citizens, and tarnishes the American character. Sir, while I deprecate the repeal of the non-importation act of South Carolina, I console myself with the pleasing expectation that the State will retract the error they have recently and unguardedly fallen into, and I can not doubt but the honorable members from that State, on this floor, will lend their aid to effect so desirable a measure—to enact again the prohibitory statute. We are told if the House adopt the resolution, it will irritate South Carolina, notwithstanding the opposers of the resolution confess the impolitic conduct of South Carolina. I wish not to offend any of our sister States, much less, that important State whose wisdom, virtue, and patriotism, have been conspicuous on every other occasion. The opposers of the resolution inform us its adoption will both encourage and sanction the importation, and that they have a Constitutional right to import until 1808. I grant it, but I hope better things of that State; and things that accompany reformation. She has recently, with other States, emancipated herself from tyranny and oppression, and will she sully her fair fame by commencing tyrant herself? Sir, the speakers from the State of South Carolina, and particularly the honorable member who offered a resolution as a substitute for the one under consideration, delivered himself in sentiments of the most admirable humanity, and constitutional love and zeal for his country; and if he were a member from any other State in the Union, I should have the honor, I make no doubt, of voting with him for the resolution on your table. Sir, I am sensible the General Government cannot prohibit the traffic previous to the year 1808. This is one of the most humiliating concessions made by that venerable Convention which framed the Constitution, and we are bound by it. I ask, is the policy of the measure embraced by the resolution sound? I believe it is. I consider slaves a luxury—they are considered by the Constitution, three-fifths of them, to give a Representative, and I ask why not tax them? It is a sound maxim that representation and taxation should go hand in hand. To lay a tax being the only Constitutional power the General Government possesses, I think it good policy to exercise it. It is the opinion of some gentlemen, and of the honorable gentleman before me, whose sound judgment and correctness I highly approve on most occasions, that the tax is of little consideration in point of revenue. I beg leave to differ from them, when I take into consideration the wish of many influential characters to emigrate to our newly acquired territory, and carry with them slaves almost without number. We may fairly calculate that the probable number imported will not be less than one hundred thousand a year for four years, which will bring a revenue of four million of dollars; and this sum may be appropriated to remunerate

FEBRUARY, 1804.

Importation of Slaves.

H. OF R.

the veteran, war-worn old soldier, who is now languishing in misery, and whose just claim is barred by an act of limitation. I beg pardon of the House for this deviation from the subject under consideration. While I am up, I beg the indulgence of the House to permit me to relate to the House what I beheld on the road to the seat of Government—twenty or thirty negroes, chained to each other, and drove like mules to market. I asked the gentleman who appeared to have charge of them, if they were criminals? He answered with a smile, No sir; they have been sold. Sir, this awful sight gave me such sensations and emotions, that it is painful to relate and not easy to describe them. Sir, if I have been compelled, in the discharge of the duty I owe to society and my constituents, to make any remarks that have wounded the feelings of any honorable gentleman who may differ with me in sentiment, I regret it much, as I am conscious it was far from my intention. I shall give my vote for the resolution.

The State of Rhode Island, from whence I came, passed a law declaring negro children born posterior to 1784, as free as white children. Mr. Speaker, I mention this statute merely to obviate the erroneous impression, that otherwise, might be made with a view to mislead the public mind, that the citizens of Rhode Island are disposed to favor the villanous traffic. I wish not to egotize, but I can assure the House this traffic has been abhorrent to me upwards of forty years, and if I should live to see 1808—that auspicious period in our national compact which shall be exonerated from the tragic feature that has cast a shade on that valuable instrument—if the important acquisition of Louisiana gave ample cause for festivity, still greater cause shall we have when the glorious period shall arrive of 1808. That shall be my jubilee.

Mr. SOUTHARD observed that the object contemplated to be answered by the rising of the Committee was to give an opportunity to the Legislature of South Carolina to repeal the law admitting the importation of slaves. He was opposed to the rising of the Committee for this reason. He believed the House proceeding to act upon the resolution would have a much greater influence upon that State. For he did presume that the House would agree to the resolution, and to a law founded upon it; and he also believed that if they proceeded to this extent, the Legislature of South Carolina would be most likely to be induced from that very circumstance to repeal the law. We are told that a number of the citizens of that State are opposed to the law, and every representative of South Carolina on this floor regrets its passage. Mr. S. said he believed almost every member of the House was of this opinion. If then we shall dismiss this resolution, what effect will the act have on the whole United States? Will it not convey the idea that the Congress of the United States do not consider the introduction of slaves into the country a real evil? For this, Mr. S. said, he was opposed to the rising of the Committee, as it would prevent the House from declaring their sentiments on so important a question. He did not so much regret the introduction of the resolution as some gentlemen who had spoken. He rather rejoiced at it, as it gave the National Legislature an opportunity to bear their opinion against the increase of the slaves in the United States. Mr. S. said he avoided intentionally saying anything on this occasion as to the right of holding slaves already in the country; meaning to confine his remarks entirely to the impolicy and injustice of allowing new importations of them. And he was surprised, after the exposure of the evils likely to ensue from it, gentlemen still opposed the resolution. Let them look forward to what may happen before the four years shall elapse when we may make the importation a capital offence; and consider how large a number may be previously introduced. Mr. S. said he did not consider the resolution important so far as it went to raise revenue; but if any State would encourage the traffic, he thought they ought to be made to pay for it.

H. OF R.

FEBRUARY, 1804.

Mr. SLOAN declared himself against the proposed postponement, which was supported on the supposition that South Carolina would repeal the law allowing the importation of slaves, a supposition which might prove illusory. Even should the law be repealed, he saw no injury that would result from passing the resolution. Should the law not be repealed, it was extremely probable that a very large importation would take place—at least a hundred thousand might be introduced, the evil of which to the United States would be incalculable. Mr. S. said that, in his humble opinion, to pass over the business would be to create the appearance throughout the Union that Congress were disposed to sanction this traffic. He should, therefore, vote against the Committee rising.

After a few further remarks, by Mr. HUGER and Mr. LUCAS, the question was taken on the rising of the Committee, and passed in the negative—yeas 58, nays 60. When the resolution was agreed to.

The Committee rose and reported their agreement to the resolution, which the House immediately took into consideration.

Mr. WINN moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution till the first Monday in January, and required the yeas and nays.

Mr. J. CLAY said, as it was probable that he should vote for the postponement, it was proper to assign the reasons which decided his vote. From information given to the House during the present discussion, it appeared that considerable agitation existed on the subject of the law admitting the importation of slaves in the State of South Carolina. As there appeared to be considerable irritation in the State, the interposition of the House might frustrate its repeal. From the ideas of the representatives of that State, it was probable that, on fuller reflection, the Legislature would repeal this act. If, after an opportunity was given them, they should not repeal it, he should certainly vote for the resolution. But wishing to prevent the traffic, rather than to raise revenue, he should vote for the postponement.

Mr. LUCAS, Mr. SLOAN, and Mr. STANTON, concisely opposed the postponement, and Mr. CLAIBORNE supported it.

The question was then taken on the postponement, by yeas and nays, and passed in the negative—yeas 54, nays 62, as follows.

THURSDAY, February 16.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend the charter of Alexandria.

After undergoing several amendments the bill was reported to the House.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, an amendment was made—ayes 49, noes 39—by which every freeholder is made eligible as a member of the Common Council, instead of only such freeholders as are worth five hundred dollars.

On motion of Mr. LEIB, the bill was so amended as to make every freeholders eligible as Mayor, instead of requiring a freehold estate of one thousand dollars—ayes 47, noes 36.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill in addition to "An act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war;" and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported without amendment, and the farther consideration thereof postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill laying a duty on slaves imported into the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

And on motion, the House adjourned until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, February 17.

Memorials of JOHN P. VAN NESS, and others, inhabitants of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and residing on the west side of Tiber creek, in opposition to the prayer of sundry petitions lately presented to this House, "that Congress will, by law, authorize the establishment of a company for the purpose of building a bridge over Potomac river, from the western and southern extremity of the Maryland avenue, in the city of Washington, to the nearest and most convenient point of Alexander's island, in the said river," were presented to the House, and referred.

Ordered, That the committee appointed, on the seventh instant, "to inquire into the expediency of providing by law against the appointment of Judges of the Courts of the United States to other offices under the Government," have leave to report by bill, or bills, or otherwise.

Mr. LEIB, from the committee last mentioned, presented, according to order, a bill more effectually to secure the independence of the Judges of the Courts of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare a bill for altering the days of session of the Federal District Court for the district of Virginia.

Ordered, That Mr. NEWTON, Mr. LOWNDES, and Mr. GEORGE W. CAMPBELL, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

A memorial of sundry merchants of the city and State of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying that such further encouragement may be given for carrying on the fisheries of the United States, as to the wisdom of Congress shall be deemed reasonable and proper.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. HUGER, Mr. BISHOP, Mr. GRAY, Mr. CLAGGETT, and Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the propriety of amending the laws establishing the compensations of the officers of the customs; and to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. ALSTON, from the committee appointed on the fourteenth instant, presented a bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, from the committee appointed on the twenty-first of December last, presented a bill making farther provision for extinguishing the debts due from the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

A petition of Moses White and Charlotte Hazen, executor and executrix of the last will and testament of Moses Hazen, deceased, a Brigadier General in the Army of the United States, during the Revolutionary war with Great Britain, was presented to the House and read, praying to be indemnified for the losses sustained by the deceased, on account of relinquishing his half pay as a British officer, and adhering to the American cause; to which indemnification the petitioners conceive the legal representatives of the deceased are justly entitled, by a resolution of Congress, under the former Government, of the twenty-second day of January, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also a petition of Henry Lenhart, the elder, of the city of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, was presented to the House and read, praying relief against a judgment recovered against him in the Circuit Court of the United States in the district of Maryland, and execution issued thereon, in the case of a bond given by the petitioner, some time in the month of October, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, as one of the securities for a certain John Holmes, part owner, and William Smith, captain of a schooner, called the Active, bound from the port of Baltimore to the West Indies, with condition that the said John Holmes and William Smith should not, during the voyage aforesaid, violate the law prohibiting the intercourse between the United States and France, and the dependencies thereof.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting information in relation to the public lands in the neighborhood of Detroit.

The Message was read, and, together with the papers, referred to the committee appointed on the twenty-second of November last, who were directed by a resolution of this House, of the twenty-fourth of the same month, "to inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts providing for the sale of the public lands of the United States."

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed, on the thirty-first ultimo, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act providing for a Naval Peace Establishment, and for other purposes," which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee to whom were referred, on the twenty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred and three, and the twenty-fourth ultimo, the several petitions of Marcella Stanton, of Ann Alricks, and of Judith Crow, (late Judith Sayse,) of the District of Columbia, made a report thereon; which was read and considered:

Resolved, That the District Court of the District of Columbia ought to be invested with a power to grant divorces, in certain cases.

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in pursuant to the said resolution: and Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. ROGER GRISWOLD, Mr. WINN, Mr. DAWSON, and Mr. SMILIE, do prepare and bring in the same.

An engrossed bill to amend the charter of Alexandria was read the third time, and passed—ayes 79.

Previously to its passage Mr. SLOAN spoke against it, principally on account of the restriction of the right of suffrage to freeholders.

INDIANA TERRITORY.

Mr. RODNEY, from the committee to whom were referred a letter from William Henry Harrison, President of the Convention of the Representatives of the people of the Indiana Territory; also a memorial and petition from the said Convention, together with the report of a former committee on the same subject at the last session of Congress, made the following report:

That, taking into their consideration the facts stated in the said memorial and petition, they are induced to believe that a qualified suspension for a limited time of the sixth article of compact between the original States and the people and States west of the Ohio river, might be productive of benefit and advantage to the said Territory.

They do not conceive it would be proper to break in upon the system adopted for surveying and locating public lands, which experience has proved so well calculated to promote the general interest. If a preference be given to particular individuals in the present instance, an example will be set by which future claimants will obtain the same privilege. The committee are nevertheless of opinion, that after those lands shall have been surveyed, a certain number of townships should be designated, out of which the claims stated in the memorial ought to be satisfied; and that, for the encouragement of actual settlers, the right of pre-emption should be secured to them.

They consider the existing regulations contained in the ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States, which requires a freehold of fifty acres as a qualification for an elector of the General Assembly, as limiting too much the elective franchise. They conceive the vital principle of a free Government is, that taxation and representation should go together after a residence of a sufficient length to manifest the intention of becoming a permanent inhabitant, and to evince, by conduct orderly and upright, that a person is entitled to the rights of an elector. This probationary period should not extend beyond two years.

It must be the true policy of the United States, with the millions of acres of habitable country which she possesses, to cherish those principles which gave birth to her independence and created her a nation by affording an asylum to the oppressed of all countries.

One important object desired in the memorial, the extinguishment of the Indian title to certain lands, has been happily accomplished; whilst the salt spring below the mouth of the Wabash river has also been placed in a situation to be productive of every reasonable advantage.

After a careful review, and an attentive consideration of the various subjects contemplated in the memorial and petition, the committee respectfully submit to the House the following resolutions, as embracing all the objects which require the attention of Congress at this period:

Resolved, That the sixth article of the ordinance of 1787, which prohibited slavery within the said territory, be suspended in a qualified manner for ten years, so as to permit the introduction of slaves born within the United States from any of the individual States: Provided, That such individual State does not permit the importation of slaves from foreign countries: And provided further, That the descendants of all such slaves shall, if males, be free at the age of twenty-five years, and if females at the age of twenty-one years.

2. Resolved, That every white free man, of the age of twenty-one years, who has resided within the territory two years, and within that time paid a territorial tax which shall have been assessed six months before the election, shall enjoy the right of an elector of members of the General Assembly.

3. Resolved, That in all cases of sales of land within the Indiana Territory, the right of pre-emption be given to actual settlers on the same.

4. Resolved That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to cause an estimate to be made of the number and extent of the claims to lands under the resolution of Congress of the 29th of August, 1788, and the law of the 3d of March, 1796, and to lay the same before this House.

5. Resolved, That provision, not exceeding one thirty-sixth part of the public lands within the Indiana Territory, ought to be made for the support of schools within the same.

6. Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant lands to individuals for the purpose of establishing houses of entertainment, and opening certain roads.

7. Resolved, That it is inexpedient at this time to vest in the Legislature of Louisiana Territory the salt spring below the mouth of the Wabash river.

8. Resolved, That compensation ought to be made to the Attorney General of the said Territory for services performed by him on behalf of the United States.

The report was read and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, viz: "What day should be made the order to the Committee of the Whole to consider the bill laying a tax of ten dollars upon every slave imported into the United States."

Mr. LOWNDES moved that the further consideration of the bill should be postponed till the first Monday in December.

Mr. LOWNDES.—In moving a postponement of the bill to the first Monday in December next, my object is to get rid of it altogether. Gentlemen have supported the resolution upon which this bill is founded, upon such a variety of, and contradictory grounds, that their arguments are not very susceptible of a reply. I am, however, very glad that it has been conceded by every gentleman who has spoken upon the subject, that this tax, if laid, would not have the effect of diminishing the number of Africans imported into the country. When it was admitted that the object for which the resolution was avowedly brought forward, would not be obtained, I did hope that the resolution itself would not have been persevered in. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. GREGG,) to whose arguments I generally listen with pleasure, has told us that he would not for the world give his vote for this tax, for the purpose of raising revenue; but that he would be obliged to vote for the resolution, to show his disapprobation of the trade. The gentleman did, however, manifest a disposition to get rid of the question, without taking a direct vote upon it. Another gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMILE) has told us, that he too is averse to this tax with a view to revenue, but that he must vote for it, for if he does not, it will be an admission, on his part, that Congress is favorable to the trade. What am I to infer from this observation? Am I to infer that Congress until this time has been favorable to the trade; and am I to infer that the gentleman himself, who has for so long a time been an active member of Congress, has also been favorable to it? This trade has from the adoption of the Constitution until a few years ago, when it was first prohibited by Georgia, been carried on; and yet Congress have never exercised their power of imposing any tax, nor have I heard that the gentleman did ever bring forward a resolution for the purpose. Upon many topics a difference of opinion must be expected to exist; but I cannot help expressing my surprise that gentlemen should advocate a tax, which they admit will not have the effect of a restraint, upon the principle that it is a legislative discountenance of the trade. This is a commercial as well as agricultural country, and we have ever estimated the national prosperity by the extent of the revenue. From imposts on importation is derived the whole revenue of the United States. Will the gentleman then, say, that the impost on foreign merchandise, or the produce of the West Indies, is a discouragement of the trade with the places from whence they are brought? I imagine he will not. And with as little reason can it be said that the tax upon slaves is a discouragement of the slave trade.—When a Government, by laying taxes, derives a revenue from a trade, and by that means participates in the profits and gains of it, it is in my opinion giving an approbation of it. Another gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. LUCAS) has strenuously contended for the imposition of this tax; and, to do him justice, he has been consistent throughout his argument. Revenue is his object, and he has told you that a great amount will be produced by this tax. It doubtless will produce considerable revenue; and in proportion to it, ought, in my opinion, to be the aversion of those who are inimical to the trade. I will repeat, sir, what I said on a former debate, that there are in the Southern States many persons who are attached to this trade, and who will yield it with reluctance.

FEBRUARY, 1804.

Importation of Slaves.

H. OF R.

8th CON.—33

Their influence in the country and in this House will necessarily be greatly increased by the immense accession of territory to the westward; the cultivation of which we have been told, even in an official memoir, will require the labor of slaves. Is it then politic in the enemies of this trade, under these circumstances, to superadd to the law of the State of South Carolina, one of Congress, by which the United States will become partakers in the profits and whatever else is connected with it? I think not. And why should this tax be laid with the view of deriving revenue? The State of South Carolina pays to the Government of the United States, for her wealth, population, and extent of country, as largely as any State in the Union. If the exigencies of the country require it, I hope the people of that State will not be unwilling to pay more, but not to be subjected to a tax which will fall exclusively on her while the rest of the community will bear no part of it. This was my idea when I said it would be a tax on the agriculture of the State, and not, as the gentleman from New York represented me as saying, "that it would be a discouragement of agriculture." I do not believe the agriculture of the State would be discouraged by it. I do not believe that it would be carried on with less activity or success. But the tax, if imposed, will be partial, and therefore unjust. I do not believe that a land tax would operate as a discouragement of agriculture; but when the United States, generally, have been relieved from the payment of one, I think it highly injurious that it should be continued, in this indirect way, on the State of South Carolina. This tax will draw from the landed interest of that State a greater amount than was her proportion of the late land tax. But, say gentlemen, this is not a tax intended to be confined to any one State, but a general one upon Africans imported into the United States, and will attach upon them into whatever State they are imported. This is indeed the law, but when it is known that the State of South Carolina is the one only into which they will be imported—that in every other they are prohibited by the laws of the State—the result is too unequivocal to be denied that it is a tax exclusively falling on the State where the importation is admitted. There is another description of persons imported into the United States—I mean those bound to serve for a term of years. The comparison I admit is not analogous throughout, but it is to a certain extent. These persons are chiefly introduced into the States of Pennsylvania, and New York; none, or at least very few of them, into New England. Were it proposed to embrace them by this tax, would the representatives from those States be satisfied with the arguments that it was a tax upon merchandise, and a general one, and therefore fair? Their discernment would quickly point out to them, that whatever was the appearance, it was a tax principally falling upon those States, and they would resist. Plaster of Paris is evidently an object of merchandise, and in those districts of the country where it is found advantageous as a manure, gives immense fertility to the land; but it is only particular districts where it is of any utility. A tax therefore upon plaster of Paris, however general the law by which it was imposed, would be a tax upon those particular districts where it is used and would be beneficial. I should be sorry if Government availed itself of this fortuitous but fortunate circumstance for these districts, and should draw a revenue from them by an imposition of a tax upon plaster of Paris. It has been contended by some gentlemen, but very unnecessarily, that it is Constitutional to lay this tax; it never was pretended to be otherwise: the Constitution expressly gives the right, but Congress has never exercised it, nor do I see the policy or the justice of doing it at this time. It will not answer the end which was designed, for it is conceded that it will not restrain the importation, but, on the contrary, will oppose greater difficulties to the exercise of the power, when Congress shall be possessed of it, of prohibiting the trade absolutely. When the period does arrive when Congress will have the power of legislating conclusively upon this subject, and it is only four years off, something more than a law will be necessary; unless active and vigilant measures are taken to enforce it, no law will be availing. An armed force on our coasts will be necessary, to prevent the introduction of them into our country; if the law of the State had been aided by such means, the repeal which has given rise to the discussion would never have taken place.

H. OF R.

FEBRUARY, 1804.

Entertaining the opinions which I have expressed against the principle of the bill, and wishing to get rid of it in a manner most agreeable to those gentlemen who feel a difficulty of voting directly upon it, I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until December next.

Mr. BEDINGER said he felt the greatest veneration for the honorable mover of the resolution, as he thought it proceeded from the purest motives. But as he thought the slave trade was but little better than murder, he felt a difficulty in his mind as to the propriety of admitting one shilling of it into the Treasury of the United States, lest those traders should think themselves entitled to protection; but as the mover and many others declare their assent towards the appropriation of said tax hereafter to humane purposes, he believed he should vote for a bill, if drawn in correspondence with such principles.

Mr. FINDLEY observed that it was not his wish to go into a lengthy argument on this subject; but merely to observe that this was the first instance of a law prohibiting the importation of slaves being repealed, and that it might not be the last; and that, therefore, if the argument advanced by gentlemen was good against taking it up in the first instance, it would be equally good against taking it up in case all the States should repeal their prohibitory laws. He also wished gentlemen to consider that the friends of the motion were conscience-bound as well as they, and that they considered it a moral duty to restrain, as far as they could, the continuance of the slave trade. As, however, a question of expediency was involved in this measure, he entertained no desire to hasten its decision; on the contrary, his wish was to allow ample time for considering its merits. He should therefore vote against the postponement to December; but would move a postponement to the 2d Monday of March, not with the view of getting rid of the subject altogether, but to allow an opportunity of considering it fully.

Mr. HUGER did not rise with the view of going into the merits of the bill, but to impress the propriety of agreeing to the postponement. It was a painful subject, which necessarily excited unpleasant feelings. He thought, if gentlemen suffered it to lay over to the next session, there was a probability that by giving the representatives of South Carolina an opportunity of returning home and expressing the sentiments of Congress, the Legislature of that State would repeal the law; whereas, should the tax be laid, it would prevent this desirable effect. Where we differ, said Mr. H., it is proper for us to accommodate—to meet each other half way.

Mr. SLOAN said a few words against the postponement.

Mr. CONRAD hoped the postponement would not be agreed to, but that the main question would be met directly. He was sorry any State was implicated in the proposed tax, but it rested with every State to pay it, or not, by allowing or prohibiting the introduction of slaves. He moved for the taking the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMILIE said he thought it incumbent on the Government of the United States to show their disapprobation of the slave trade. As to the revenue to be derived from this tax, it was no object with him; and as to checking the importation, he did not believe it would have the effect. He could, therefore, perceive but one object of this act, to wit: that the Government of the United States should express their disapprobation of the act of the Legislature of South Carolina. However, for the reasons assigned by the representatives of that State, he would agree to postpone the consideration of the bill to the second Monday of March.

Mr. LUCAS replied at some length, to the arguments in favor of the postponement.

Mr. EPPES, believing that either motion of postponement would defeat the main measure, said he should vote against both. It was not his wish to erect the Government of the United States into a national tribunal to censure the proceedings of the Legislature of South Carolina, or to wound their feelings; but he was not prepared to say that Congress, in exercising a Constitutional right, erected such a tribunal. It was in some respects immaterial whether they interfered or not, so long as the world knew that a Legislature of a respectable State, in the eighteenth century, passed an act allowing the importation of slaves. That Legislature ought not to complain if the United States availed themselves of the measure to raise revenue from it. According to the estimate of some gentlemen, there would probably be an importation of one hundred thousand in four years, which, if this tax shall be laid, will produce a revenue of a million of dollars. And yet we are entreated by the gentleman from South Carolina not to molest the trade. Mr. E. said he was not surprised at this anxiety, as, by gaining a delay of one year, that State might be saved from the payment of above one hundred thousand dollars.

FEBRUARY, 1804.

Importation of Slaves.

H. OF R.

Mr. E. said he came from a Southern country, where slaves were as much a subject of taxation as lands; and he did not know that the statute books of Virginia or South Carolina were stained by imposing taxes upon them. He believed them as fair a subject of taxation as any other species of property. He believed it as fair to lay taxes upon them as to make the poor pay a tax upon brown sugar and other articles of the first necessity. For these reasons he was against the postponement either to December or March.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD considered a postponement till December as destructive to the bill. He said he would as soon meet it on its merits, but being prepared, as far as his vote went, to reject the bill, he should vote for what he considered equivalent, a postponement to December. He did not think it proper for the House to go into the measure contemplated by the bill. There were but two principles that would justify the laying a duty on imported articles: the one to discourage the importation of particular articles, and the other with a view to revenue. As to the first principle, under the Constitution as it at present stood, Congress had no right to interfere; as the States had an undoubted right to admit the importation of slaves until the year 1808. The Constitution, on this point, had gone so far as to restrict the right of the General Government to a tax not exceeding ten dollars upon each slave imported. This would not amount to a prohibition or prevention of the importation. Congress was, therefore, precluded the right of taxing, with this view, until the year 1808. This part of the argument, on which gentlemen support the measure, must be laid, therefore, out of view. The question then recurs, whether we shall lay this tax for purposes of revenue? For one, (said Mr. G.) I am unwilling to do this. I abhor the slave trade as much as any member on this floor, and therefore I will not consent to give it a legislative sanction. For this measure will certainly be viewed in that light by the people of this country and by the civilized world. It will appear to the world that Congress are raising a revenue from a commerce in slaves. I am not for introducing such a law, calculated to have this impression, on our statute books. Were it in our power to prohibit the trade, there is not, I trust, a member on this floor that would not unite in the prohibition. But on this point our hands are tied. We can only avail ourselves of the trade as a subject of revenue. The sum likely to be raised from this tax may be as great as has been mentioned; but if the raising of it be connected with the passage of a law that recognises a traffic in human flesh, so far as fixing the price at which it may be freely carried on, will have this effect, I, for one, must protest against it.

Viewing this tax in the aspect of revenue, there does not appear to be any occasion for it. We have no report from the Secretary of the Treasury that the Treasury is deficient in receipts. For these reasons, said Mr. G., and because this subject is calculated to produce unpleasant impressions on this floor and elsewhere, I shall vote for the postponement to December.

Mr. GREGG observed, that when this subject was on a former day before the House, he assigned his reasons, at some length, in favor of a postponement. The same reasons would influence his vote this day, and he should not trouble the House with a repetition of them. He only rose to suggest to his colleague that, by attending to one consideration, he would be induced, he thought, to change his opinion, and to vote for the most distant day to which it was proposed to postpone this subject. It had been stated by a gentleman from South Carolina, and he believed correctly stated, that by the law lately passed in South Carolina, a considerable ferment had been excited in that State, and that it was probable that the Legislature would, at their next session, repeal it. If it were probable that they would repeal this law in April, it appeared to him improper to pass an act that would operate as a censure upon the conduct of that State.

Mr. ALSTON was surprised how it was that he and his worthy friend from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) differed so widely upon the present occasion, living, as it were, in the same country, and owning property of the same kind, and pursuing the same means of obtaining a living. My friend advocates the resolution for laying a tax of ten dollars on each slave imported into the United States, because a considerable revenue will be derived from such a tax; it is for that very reason that he opposed it, because he would not consent to pass a law which had for its operation a partial effect. Can it be right to pass a law which will impose a heavy tax upon one part of the community, and not a cent upon the other? No State in the Union would be affected except South Carolina. Gentlemen ought to take care how they acted towards a sister State, and a respectable one too.

Whenever a tax is to be laid by Congress, such objects of taxation should be selected as would apply generally to every part of the Union. In the present case, it was impossible that the contemplated tax would be general; for in some of the States in this Union slavery was prohibited by their constitution—they had incorporated a clause which prevented a slave from being carried into them. How then, sir, can the effect of the resolution now before you have an uniform operation, if it should be adopted, and a law passed in conformity thereto? He therefore hoped it would not obtain; at the same time he wished it to be understood that he was not friendly to the slave trade, and could the resolution now under consideration operate equally throughout the Union, he would have no objection to it. Viewing the thing, therefore, as he did, as calculated to cause discontent and uneasiness to so respectable a State as that of South Carolina, he could not but hope that however much gentlemen might be opposed to the slave trade generally, that in the present case, under all existing circumstances, they would permit it to remain as it was: perhaps South Carolina would revoke what she had done, and everything become quiet upon the subject before the next session of Congress. This is an extremely delicate subject, and one in which the feelings of almost the whole Southern country are always alive. Why will gentlemen choose to agitate it upon this floor? It can answer no good purpose. Those gentlemen who are not interested in this description of property ought to let us alone, and permit us to enjoy it as the necessity of the case requires.

Mr. JACKSON said, if he were of opinion that the law of South Carolina, allowing the importation of slaves, would be repealed before the occurrence of the baleful effects to be apprehended from it, he might be in favor of the proposed postponement. But, when he recollected that the gentleman (Mr. LOWMEYER) who first rose in opposition to the imposition of a tax, stated the defective measures of the United States in preventing an illicit trade from being carried on, as one of the grounds of the act of South Carolina, he was induced to believe that the Legislature of that State would not repeal a law enacted under such circumstances. The observation of the gentleman that, notwithstanding persons carrying on this traffic, when illicit, were subjected to a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, one thousand of which were to go to the informer, and to imprisonment not exceeding two years, there were no prosecutions and no convictions, induced him (Mr. J.) to believe that the trade was favored by South Carolina, and that, of consequence, that State would not consent to repeal the law.

Mr. J. said, he was induced to view the postponement as intended entirely to defeat the object of the bill, and he should therefore vote against a postponement to any day, however near, under the hope that the session would be soon terminated. He contended that if a postponement was effected for one year, or to the first Monday in March, the effect produced would be the same—an entire frustration of the measure. He had no doubt that a delayed interposition would, by permitting, in the meantime, importations to a great extent, supersede the necessity of all interference. Before the next session, it was probable that one or two hundred thousand slaves would be introduced, or, at any rate, as many as would fully supply the market. If, therefore, it is our intention to legislate at all on this subject, let us take time by the forelock, and act now or never.

Without entering into a consideration of the arguments, urged the other day, I will advert to the argument used to-day by the gentleman from South Carolina, who compares the proposed duty to a tax on agriculture, and thence infers its impolicy. Anything which tends to depreciate the price of articles here by importations from abroad is an injury to agriculture. What will be the result of the additional importation of slaves? Our agriculture will produce beyond our necessities, and in proportion to that increase will the surplus articles raised and the price of labor be diminished. The proposed tax will repress the importation of slaves, and thus prevent, in some degree, this effect. For, if we advert to the import duties, we shall find that when a duty is laid on a foreign article of the like description with that raised in the United States, it operates as a premium on the latter. In the same proportion will the proposed tax enhance the value of slaves at present within the United States.

Gentlemen say the proposed tax will legalize the trade, and render it the duty of the United States to protect it. This argument is conclusively answered by asking, whether any vessel sailing under the flag of the United States, and pursuing a lawful commerce, is not entitled to the protection of the Government? by asking whether a vessel sailing to the coast of Africa, and there kidnapping negroes, under the authority of a State, is not as much entitled to protection as any other vessel, however differently engaged? On this point our laws know of no distinction. All vessels, engaged in unforbidden traffic, are entitled to the same protection. So that we shall not, by imposing this tax, legalize the trade, to any further extent than it is already legalized by the existing state of things.

The gentleman from South Carolina alleges that, if this tax is contemplated to prevent the importation of slaves, it will not have the effect intended. But, although it might not have this effect, Mr. J. was anxious that Congress should oppose to it all the obstacles in their power. Believing that the interests of the United States were deeply implicated in the measure, and that if anything will induce the people of South Carolina to repeal the law, it would be an evidence of the opinion entertained respecting it by the collected representation of the nation, he should vote most cordially against the postponement.

Mr. RODNEY said, he should not have troubled the House with any remarks on the present occasion, had he not made up his mind to vote differently from the vote which he had before given. He said he had before voted against the postponement of the consideration of this subject; he should now vote in favor of a postponement; and he would, in a few words, assign his reasons. When the resolution for imposing a tax on imported slaves was first laid on the table, he was of opinion that he could not vote for it without sanctioning the practice it was meant to censure. Reflecting further, he afterwards got his own consent to vote for it. First thoughts were frequently best; we sometimes miss the mark by taking sight too long. In this instance, after a more mature consideration, his mind inclined to his original opinions, for reasons which he would assign.

It was agreed, on all hands, that the conduct of the Legislature of South Carolina was such as not to merit the disapprobation of the members of that House. On many occasions there were political dissensions within these walls. But he rejoiced that, when questions of this kind presented themselves, they were sure to find us unanimous. Inhumanity was considered as a common enemy, and so inhuman a practice was justly reprobated by all. Every gentleman from the South, as well as the East, deprecated the act and lamented its existence.

H. OF R.

There is one view in which the passage of this act would be extremely improper. If it were in their power to lay a duty on the importation of slaves, that would amount to a prohibition, they ought not to hesitate. But they had no such power. If we have not, said Mr. R., we ought to hesitate before we assume the moral chair, and impose upon the proceedings of an independent State, a censure, however just. If we do not possess the power, we ought to pause and consider the natural effects of the proposed measure, before we go into it. If the tax will not prohibit the trade, upon what principle can it be passed or justified? Can it be passed with the view of bringing into the public coffers a certain sum? Is it from so impure a fountain that streams are to flow to enable the Government to meet the national emergencies? If this is its object, I will put a striking case. Suppose all the expenses of the Government of the United States would be defrayed by a tax on the slave trade, would gentlemen grasp it on this account? would they agree that a nation of freemen should support their Government by a tax on slaves? Would they proclaim to the world that a free nation existed by slavery? If they would prohibit the trade by taxation, it would not be worth a cent.

Another consideration ought to have weight. It is very probable that the Legislature of South Carolina passed the law from the impulse of the moment, for it has been declared on this floor that the people of the State are not friendly to it, that it excites a feeling in the community, and that when the Representatives shall be fully apprized of the sentiments of their constituents, they will repeal the law. If we enact the bill on the table, we give it our sanction, and the opinion will go forth to that State that slaves may be rightfully imported on the payment of the tax, and this impression will undoubtedly add to the number imported. I do not know that we can act better to the Legislatures of the several States, than in the language of the poet:

"Be to their faults a little blind,
And to their virtues very kind."

We had better, then, delay acting on this business until the general sentiment of the State shall be ascertained. If we believe, as we have reason, the general sentiment hostile to the act, let us give it an opportunity deliberately to express itself, without the infliction of a censure that, by creating irritation in the minds of her citizens, may tend to frustrate the end we all have in view. In this view, I am in favor of the postponement. No man can ascribe to me a friendship to slavery. I have been uniformly and warmly opposed to it. To blot it out of the pages of our country is one of the objects nearest my heart. In my own State I have hitherto maintained an unequal conflict on this subject. But great is the force of truth, and it will prevail. No person can abhor and detest the miserable traffic in human flesh more than I do. I hope to live to see the day, when, to use the language of an eloquent advocate, "liberty shall become commensurate with our soil. When

'we shall proclaim to every stranger and sojourner, the moment he sets his foot on American earth; the ground on which he stands is holy and consecrated by the genius of universal emancipation. No matter in what language his doom may have been pronounced; no matter what complexion, incompatible with freedom, an Indian or an African sun may have burnt upon him; no matter in what disastrous battle his liberty may have been cloven down; no matter with what solemnities he may have been devoted on the altar of slavery; the first moment he touches the sacred soil of America, the altar and the god shall sink together in the dust; his soul shall walk abroad in her own majesty; his body shall swell beyond the measure of his chains, which burst from around him, and he shall stand redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled by the great genius of universal emancipation."

But it is impossible, with our limited powers, by a mighty fiat of legislation, to effect this great object. I am unwilling, therefore, to legislate unless we can legislate with effect. I trust, then, we shall agree to the postponement, and thereby give to the freemen of South Carolina an opportunity of expressing their deliberate opinion on the act recently passed by the Legislature, and which, I trust for the honor of the State, will occasion its repeal.

Mr. ELMER considered the question of postponement as that which, in its decision, would determine the passage of the bill. He believed that the principle of the bill was predicated on a sound principle of morality and political economy. He was sorry that existing circumstances brought before Congress a question of this kind, calculated to affect the feelings of gentlemen who represented some of the Southern States; but, being brought up, it ought to be met fairly and fully. If the proposed measure is not bottomed on sound political principles, it ought to be rejected; but, if it is so bottomed, it ought to pass.

Mr. E. did not see that this measure had any pointed relation to South Carolina in particular. If agreed to, it will only appear that Congress are hostile to the importation of slaves, and have, therefore, passed a law laying the only imposition on them authorized by the Constitution. It was generally understood to be the sense of the people of the United States, that the importation of slaves was improper. But, in the formation of the Constitution, the States had reserved to themselves the right of importation until the year 1808. They have, therefore, at present, the clear Constitutional right to import them. But the Constitution has given to the Government of the United States another right; that of taxing the slaves imported, to a certain amount. It declares that the General Government shall not prohibit the importation of slaves, but that it may benefit the Treasury by taxing them.

Mr. E. said he considered it a sound principle of finance to tax those articles whose importation operated most injuriously to society. In this view, slaves were the fairest subject of taxation. On these articles, as on others, those who use them will pay the tax imposed. To him it was strange reasoning to say, because a tax of ten dollars will not entirely prohibit the importation, it will therefore not decrease it. He, on the contrary, verily believed that fewer ships would be fitted out for carrying on this traffic, after the passage of this law, than are at present. Those who carry on the trade will calculate their profits, which will be diminished by as much as the tax amounts to; which will, to its extent, operate as a discouragement to the trade. If a tax of two hundred dollars would prohibit the trade altogether, it may be fairly inferred that, under a tax of ten dollars, not more than nineteen twentieths of the number that would otherwise be imported will be introduced, and perhaps a lesser number.

H. OF R.

Mr. E. could not see the least impropriety in the proposed tax, on national principles. It is alleged that its operation will be partial. It was unnecessary to inquire in what parts of the Union the objects of this tax principally existed. Wherever they are found advantageous they will exist; it is, besides, in the power of any State, feeling a repugnance to the tax, to get rid of it by disallowing the importation.

For these reasons, and for others already urged, Mr. E. said he should vote against the postponement.

After a few additional remarks from several gentlemen, the question was taken by yeas and nays on a postponement to the first Monday in December, and passed in the negative—yeas 55, nays 62, as follows:

Mr. FINDLEY moved a postponement to the second Monday in March; which, after some debate, prevailed—ayes 56, noes 50.

[To prevent an erroneous impression being made on the public by the above proceedings, it is proper to remark that, during the whole discussion, not a single voice was raised in defence of the act of the Legislature of South Carolina, allowing the importation of slaves; but that, on the contrary, while by some of the speakers its immorality and impolicy were severely censured, by all its existence was deprecated. A large number of those who voted for the postponement, advocated it on the express and sole ground that it would give the Legislature of South Carolina an opportunity, which they believed would be embraced, to repeal the act.]

SATURDAY, February 18.

Mr. EPPES offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether the moneys drawn from the Treasury of the United States on account of the Marine Corps, from the year 1798 to the end of the year 1803, have been faithfully applied to the public service, in conformity to existing laws.

The resolution was immediately taken up, agreed to, and referred to Messrs. EPPES, SANDS, McCREERY, LEIB, and BOYLE.

Mr. MOORE offered a resolution instructing the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to employ persons to explore such parts of the province of Louisiana as he may think proper; and to report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. M. said, it was scarcely necessary to make any remarks on the object of this resolution. The Government were not in possession of a good geographical description of Louisiana, which it was very desirable that they should possess, inasmuch as its limits were not completely designated in the articles of cession, and as the time might not, perhaps, be distant, when its boundaries may be a subject of negotiation between the former owners of the province and the United States.

The resolution was agreed to—ayes 53.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the subject of laying duties for the support of light-houses.

The report is accompanied with several documents, and concludes with a resolution that a duty of forty cents a ton be laid on foreign vessels entering the ports of the United States, for the support of light-houses.

The House took up the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill making provision for persons disabled by known wounds received during the Revolutionary war.

Mr. ELLIOT moved the following amendment, which was agreed to without a division :

"And also all those persons who, in consequence of known wounds received in the actual service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war, have, at any period since, become disabled in such manner as to render them unable to procure a subsistence by manual labor."

The further consideration of the bill was then postponed to Tuesday next.

A message was received from the Senate stating that they had passed a bill relating to the recording and registering vessels in the district of New Orleans.

The bill allows all the inhabitants of Louisiana, on the 30th of April last, to obtain registers.—Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday.

On motion of Mr. LEIB,
Resolved, That it is expedient to abolish the office of Lieutenant Colonel Commandant of the Marine Corps.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. LEIB, Mr. LEMUEL WILLIAMS, and Mr. JACKSON, do prepare and bring in the same.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. LATIMORE, after some preliminary observations, offered the following resolution; which was agreed to :

"Resolved, That the committee who was directed to inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts providing for the sale of the public lands of the United States, be directed to inquire—

"Whether any, and, if any, what additional compensation ought to be allowed to the several officers appointed under the act, entitled 'An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee';

"Whether any, and, if any, what additional allowance ought to be made for the expense of surveying the lands in the Mississippi Territory;

"Whether any, and, if any, what alterations ought to be made in such parts of the act aforesaid as provide for laying out the public lands in the said Territory into townships and sections, and for disposing of the same agreeably to that plan;

"Whether any, and, if any, what reduction in the price and quantity of land ought to be made in favor of those settlers who hold, under the third section of the said act, a right of pre-emption only;

"Whether any, and, if any, what further time ought to be allowed for laying in of claims before the registers of the land offices in the Territory aforementioned;

"Whether it be expedient to exempt from a re-survey such tracts of land as are held by titles legally and fully executed; and likewise such tracts, the quantities of which are already ascertained, and the titles to which are confirmed by the act aforesaid; and

"Whether an act of Congress be necessary to legalize the proceedings of the commissioners for the district east of Pearl river, in consequence of their not having met on or before the first day of December last, agreeably to the sixth section of the act abovementioned."

MONDAY, February 20.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

A memorial of William Eaton was presented to the House and read, stating that, during his residence at Tunis, in Barbary, as Consul and Agent of the United States, he incurred certain expenses which are deemed not to come within Executive discretion; that he has also received, in his capacity aforesaid, from the King of Denmark, "a token of satisfaction," for services rendered to subjects of Denmark, and praying that Congress will indemnify his said expenses, and decide upon the Constitutional propriety of his retaining "the token of satisfaction," aforesaid. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

A memorial of sundry merchants of the city of New Orleans, in the province of Louisiana, was presented to the House and read, stating the great inconveniences under which they labor, through the want of an extension to them of the laws of the United States; that they are yet subject to duties on their exports and imports, according to the Spanish tariff; and that for want of proper documents to navigate with, their ships and vessels are laid up in a perishing state; and praying that Congress will make provision for their relief in the premises.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole to whom was committed, on the eighteenth instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act relating to the recording, registering, and enrolling of ships or vessels in the district of Orleans."

Mr. LEIB, from the committee appointed on the eighteenth instant, presented a bill to repeal the act fixing the rank and pay of the commanding officer of the Corps of Marines; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the courts of the United States to appoint commissioners to take depositions of witnesses out of court, to administer oaths to appraisers, and for other purposes. The bill was reported with an amendment; which was read twice, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered That the said bill, together with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alteration ought to be made in the times of holding the district court in the State of Rhode Island; and that they report by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. STANTON, Mr. CUTLER, and Mr. THOMPSON, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. NEWTON, from the committee appointed on the seventeenth instant, presented a bill altering the days of session of the district court for the district of Virginia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. THOMAS, from the joint committee of the two Houses, made a report, specifying the business, in their opinion, necessary to be transacted the present session, and concluding with a resolution that it be closed the 12th of March.

Messrs. HUGER and VARNUM advocated an immediate agreement to the report; and Messrs. NICHOLSON, LEIB, SMILIE, FINDLEY, and S. L. MITCHILL supported a postponement.

The motion to postpone its consideration to Friday was agreed to—yeas 56, nays 49.

Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHILL, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to provide for light-houses and buoys in the cases therein mentioned, and to establish the district of Saint Mary's for that of Nanjemoy; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

GEORGIA CLAIMS.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said, the House would recollect that he had, on a former day, offered a resolution barring any claims derived under any act of the State of Georgia passed in the year 1795, in relation to lands ceded to the United States. It was not his purpose in rising at this time to trespass on the patience of the House; nor did he know that he should in future offer any remarks additional to those he had already made. But he conceived it his duty to place the subject in such a point of light that every eye, however dim, might distinctly see its true merits. For this purpose he withdrew the resolution which he had before offered, and moved the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Georgia were, at no time, invested with the power of alienating the right of soil possessed by the good people of that State in and to the vacant territory of the same, but in a rightful manner, and for the public good:

That, when the governors of any people shall have betrayed the confidence reposed in them, and shall have exercised that authority with which they have been clothed for the general welfare, to promote their own private ends, under the basest motives, and to the public detriment, it is the inalienable right of a people, so circumstanced, to revoke the authority thus abused, to resume the rights thus attempted to be bartered, and to abrogate the act thus endeavoring to betray them:

That it is in evidence to this House, that the act of the Legislature of Georgia, passed on the seventh of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, entitled "An act for appropriating a part of the unlocated territory of this State, for the payment of the late State troops, and for other purposes," was passed by persons under the influence of gross and palpable corruption, practised by the grantees of the lands attempted to be alienated by the aforesaid act, tending to enrich and aggrandize, to a degree almost incalculable, a few individuals, and ruinous to the public interest:

That the good people of Georgia, impressed with general indignation at this act of atrocious perfidy and unparalleled corruption, with a promptitude of decision highly honorable to their character, did, by the act of a subsequent Legislature, passed on the thirteenth of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, under circumstances of peculiar solemnity, and finally sanctioned by the people, who have subsequently ingrafted it on their constitution, declare the preceding act, and the grants made under it, in themselves null and void; that the said act should be expunged from the records of the State, and publicly burnt; which was accordingly done; provision at the same time being made for restoring the pretended purchase-money to the grantees, by whom, or by persons claiming under them, the greater part of the said purchase-money has been withdrawn from the treasury of Georgia:

That a subsequent Legislature of an individual State has an undoubted right to repeal any act of a preceding Legislature, provided such repeal be not forbidden by the constitution of such State, or of the United States:

That the aforesaid act of the State of Georgia, passed on the thirteenth of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, was forbidden neither by the constitution of that State, nor by that of the United States:

That the claims of persons derived under the aforesaid act of the seventh of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, are recognised neither by any compact between the United States and the State of Georgia, nor by any act of the Federal Government: Therefore,

Resolved, That no part of the five millions of acres reserved for satisfying and quieting claims to the lands ceded by the State of Georgia to the United States, and appropriated by the act of Congress passed at their last session, shall be appropriated to quiet or compensate any claims derived under any act, or pretended act, of the State of Georgia, passed, or alleged to be passed, during the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

On considering the resolutions, the House divided—ayes 53. Carried.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH then moved their reference to the Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the settlement of sundry claims to public lands lying south of the State of Tennessee. Carried—yeas 50, nays 30.

INDIANA TERRITORY.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of a select committee on the bill from the Senate, to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate Governments. The report, for the reasons assigned, recommends a rejection of the bill.

The report was supported by Messrs. GREGG and LYON, principally on the ground that the population around Detroit was too small to justify the expenses attending a separate Territorial Government; and on the ground that if the advantages derived from a separate Government were conferred on them, they might, and would be claimed, with equal justice, by several detached settlements in the Mississippi and Louisiana Territories.

The report was opposed by Messrs. LUCAS, JACKSON, SLOAN, and MORROW, on a variety of grounds. They contended that equal justice was due to every member of the American community, and that of course, however small the population, it was entitled to the same protection with a community composed of larger numbers; that the distance of this population from St. Vincennes was so great as to deprive them of the benefits resulting from the administration of justice; that Michilimackinac, which exported produce valued at above $200,000, and from whose imports the United States derived a revenue of $17,000 was more than eight hundred miles from the present seat of Government.

The question being put on agreeing to the report, it passed in the negative—yeas 34.

When the bill from the Senate was read, and so amended as to designate the new Territory by the name of Michigan, instead of Northwestern Territory; and the Committee rose and reported the bill, which was ordered by the House to a third reading to-morrow.

THURSDAY, February 21.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia,'" with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to ascertain the boundary of the lands reserved by the State of Virginia, northwest of the river Ohio, for the satisfaction of her officers and soldiers on Continental establishment, and to limit the period for locating the said lands;" also, a bill, entitled "An act to erect a light-house on the south end of St. Simon's Island, in the State of Georgia, and for the placing a buoy or buoys on or near St. Simon's bar;" to which bills, respectively, the Senate desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to erect a light-house on the south end of St. Simon's island, in the State of Georgia, and for the placing a buoy or buoys on or near St. Simon's bar," was read twice and committed to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to ascertain the boundary of the lands reserved by the State of Virginia, northwest of the river Ohio, for the satisfaction of her officers and soldiers on Continental establishment and to limit the period for locating the said lands," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia,'" Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said bill, together with the amendments, be committed to Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. JOSEPH LEWIS JR., and Mr. ELLIOT.

INDIANA TERRITORY.

A bill to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate governments was read the third time.

Mr. HOLLAND moved to postpone its further consideration until the first Monday in November next.

This motion was supported by Messrs. HOLLAND, SANDFORD, and S. L. MITCHELL, and opposed by Messrs. MORROW and SLOAN; and was disagreed to—yeas 56, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—John Archer, David Bard, Phaniel Bishop, Adam Boyd, Robert Brown, Joseph Bryan, William Butler, William Chamberlin, Martin Chittenden, Clifton Claggett, Thomas Claiborne, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, Frederick Conrad, Jacob Crowninshield, Richard Cutts, John B. Van Rensselaer, Joseph B. Varnum, Matthew Walton, Lemuel Williams, and Marmaduke Williams.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and passed in the negative—yeas 58, nays 59.

The bill is therefore lost.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1804. Mr. LEIB moved to strike out the appropriation of $11,885 for fifteen per cent. compensation to clerks, additional to that allowed by the act to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH opposed the motion; which was agreed to—yeas 42, nays 36.

The Committee, having filled the respective blanks, reported the bill. The House negatived the amendment of Mr. LEIB, respecting compensation to clerks—yeas 42, nays 46—and reinstated the appropriation struck out in committee. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

On motion, the House adjourned.

FEBRUARY, 1804.

WEDNESDAY, February 22.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed on the twenty-second of November last, who were directed by a resolution of this House of the twenty-fourth of the same month "to inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts providing for the sale of the public lands of the United States," made a farther report, in part, thereon; which was read, and committed to the Committee of the whole House to whom is committed a farther report, in part, of the same committee, made on the twenty-seventh of January last.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "An act for the relief of the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. STANTON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill, to alter the time of holding the district court in the State of Rhode Island; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole to whom was committed, on the 20th instant, the bill altering the days of session of the district court for the district of Virginia.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and four, was read the third time and passed.

Resolved, That the committee to whom were referred a petition of the inhabitants of the district of Washington, in the Mississippi Territory, and a memorial of the House of Representatives of the said Territory, relative to the establishment of a separate government for that district, or the appointment of judges to reside therein, be directed to inquire whether it will be necessary to extend Federal jurisdiction to the ordinary courts, or to courts to be organized for that special purpose in the aforesaid Mississippi Territory.

Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHILL, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who were directed, by a resolution of this House, of the tenth of November last, "to inquire into the expediency of exempting pilots from paying hospital money for their apprentices, made a report thereon; which was read, and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That it is inexpedient for Congress to make any declaration concerning the payment of hospital money, for pilots, for their apprentices.

Mr. CONRAD, from the committee to whom were referred, on the twenty-third ultimo, sundry letters of the same tenor, written in the German language, and addressed to "The General Congress of the North American Free States," from the Council of Directors of the city of Memel, in the Province of East Prussia," made a report thereon; which was read and considered.

Resolved, That the said letters be transmitted by the SPEAKER of the House to the Secretary of State, with a request that he cause them to be transmitted to the Prussian Consul at Charleston, in the State of South Carolina.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the payment of drawbacks on goods exported from the places therein mentioned.

Mr. RODNEY moved a new section to the bill placing goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the district of Delaware on the same footing as to the receipt of drawbacks on exportation to any foreign country, after having been conveyed by land, with those imported into the district of Philadelphia, New York, or Baltimore.

Mr. EUSTIS opposed, and Mr. RODNEY replied.—Carried.

When the Committee rose, and the House ordered the bill to a third reading.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating a report of the Surveyor of the Public Buildings of Washington.—The Message was read, and, together with the report, referred to Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. SMILIE, Mr. HUGER, Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL, and Mr. CUTTS; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the select committee to whom were referred the amendments of the Senate to the bill supplementary to the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, reported a recommendation to agree to the same.

On agreeing to the first amendment, extending the duration of the incorporation to fifteen years, instead of five, the House divided—yeas 51, nays 35; Messrs. SOUTHARD, NICHOLSON, and S. L. MITCHILL, having previously spoken in favor of agreeing to it.

The other amendments were then agreed to without a division.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to amend the charter of Alexandria," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the last mentioned bill; and the said amendments being twice read, were agreed to by the House.

DISTRICT OF ORLEANS.

This motion was advocated by Messrs. R. GRISWOLD and SLOAN; and opposed by Messrs. NICHOLSON, EUSTIS, and RODNEY, and was agreed to—yeas 48, nays 39. On which the Committee rose and reported the bill.

On concurring with the vote of the Committee of the Whole on the amendment of Mr. R. GRISWOLD, a short debate, though of greater length than that which preceded ensued, in which the amendment was supported by Messrs. R. GRISWOLD, and DANA; and opposed by Messrs. G. W.

Lucas, Matthew Lyon, Andrew McCord, William McCreery, David Meriwether, Samuel L. Mitchell, Nicholas R. Moore, Jeremiah Morrow, Thomas Moore, Anthony New, Thomas Newton, jr., Joseph H. Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Joseph B. Varnum, Daniel C. Verplanck, Matthew Walton, Marmaduke Williams, Richard Winn, Joseph Winston, and Thomas Wynns.

By the advocates of the amendment it was contended, that however proper it might be, according to the stipulations of treaty, to extend the right of registering their vessels to the inhabitants of Louisiana, at the time of the cession, it was neither just nor obligatory upon Congress to extend this right to citizens of the United States in the ceded territory, while the like right, under similar circumstances, was refused to citizens in the Atlantic States. This was unjust, as it would enable citizens of Louisiana to naturalize foreign bottoms which they might have purchased on speculation, and to trade with them, not only in the ports of Louisiana, but also in the ports of the United States—thereby affecting the rights of those who, under the existing navigation system, had obtained registers.

On the other hand, the opponents of the amendment declared their conviction that it became the Government to place the citizens of the United States on an equal footing with the inhabitants of Louisiana, and that the denial of rights to which they conceived themselves entitled, would sow much dissatisfaction among them. It was observed that the citizens who had gone to Louisiana must have had in view their becoming inhabitants, and would therefore feel themselves aggrieved in being denied the rights extended to the inhabitants; and that the situation of citizens owning Spanish or French bottoms, previous to the cession, if inhibited from registering them, would be peculiarly hard, as great doubts were entertained whether those vessels did not, together with the ceded country, lose their national character; and if that was the fact, (and it was believed to be so,) such bottoms would be divested of all the advantages and immunities of American, Spanish, and French bottoms.

On motion of Mr. MOTT, the words "thirtieth of April," were substituted in the room of "twentieth of December," his object being to place the citizens and inhabitants on the same footing. Adopted—yeas 45, nays 36; and the bill was ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

NAVAL PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to an act providing for a Naval Peace Establishment.

[This is the bill introduced at the instance of Mr. NICHOLSON, with a view to a more economical and beneficial arrangement in relation to the national ships laid up in ordinary.]

Mr. LEIB moved an additional section, virtually abolishing the office of Lieutenant Colonel Commandant of the Marine Corps, and authorizing the President to make such other reductions of the subordinate officers as he may think fit. The object of the bill being a reform of the expenses attending the Naval Establishment, the measure contemplated in the amendment was, in his opinion, a very proper one to be answered by it. The bill, he said, contemplated an annual saving, in the single article of provisions, of $7,000. By abolishing the office of Lieutenant Colonel Commandant, a saving of sixty thousand dollars in addition might be made. This officer made, it appeared, all the contracts, and it would be seen by documents before the House, that while the price of the ration in the War Department was fifteen cents, that fixed by this officer was twenty cents—the difference made the sum of $3,750 a year. It would also be seen that exorbitant sums were expended in postage and fuel. In the single article of postage, $150 had been expended within three months. The amendment was then agreed to—yeas 62.

Mr. EUSTIS moved a new section, for the allowance to captains, holding themselves in readiness to enter the service, the same rations they are entitled by law to receive when in actual service. Disagreed to—yeas 37, nays 45.

The Committee rose, and the House agreed to the amendment of Mr. LEIB without a division.

Mr. JACKSON moved a new section, for the allowance to captains, required to hold themselves in readiness for service, of the same rations they are entitled to receive when in actual service.

Mr. NICHOLSON supported the amendment, to which the House agreed—yeas 44, nays 40; when the bill was ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

On motion, the House adjourned.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the report of the committee of the twenty-fifth ultimo, to whom were referred the petitions of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory of the United States; and of sundry residents and claimants of lands on the Alabama river, and on the east side of the river and bay of Mobile, in the said Mississippi Territory; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported two resolutions thereupon; which were twice read, and agreed to by the House as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the eighth section of the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," as provides that no certificate shall be granted for lands lying east of the Tombigbee river," ought to be repealed: Provided, That no certificate shall be granted for any lands to which the Indian title has not been extinguished.

Resolved, That the Commissioners appointed in pursuance of an act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," be authorized and required to make, on or before the first day of December next, a full report, to the Secretary of the Treasury, of all claims that may be laid before them for lands held by warrant of survey and improvement, in cases where the claimants were minors, and not heads of families, at the time such warrants were issued, with the circumstances which occasioned the issuing of such warrants, and the validity which has been considered as attached to them.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Messrs. LATTIMORE, NICHOLSON, BUTLER, BALDWIN, and RHEA of Tennessee, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House proceeded to reconsider their first amendment, disagreed to by the Senate, to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act relating to the recording, registering, and enrolling of ships or vessels in the district of Orleans;" and

Resolved That this House do recede from its said first amendment.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the post office bill. After making several amendments, the Committee rose and asked leave to sit again, which was granted.

This motion was supported by Messrs. VARNUM, BEDINGER, SLOAN, SMILIE, HOLLAND, and ELMER, and opposed by Messrs. NICHOLSON, JACKSON, and EUSTIS.

The House went into Committee, who disagreed to the above section—yeas 55, nays 37. The bill was afterwards brought in, in an engrossed form, omitting this section, and passed—yeas 63, nays 54; as follows:

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred a memorial of Andrew Moore, of Virginia, respecting the election of THOMAS LEWIS, a sitting member, made a report, which, after stating the bad votes given for each of the candidates, concludes with the opinion that THOMAS LEWIS is not, and that ANDREW MOORE is entitled to a seat in the House. The report is as follows:

"That, at an election held on three several days, in the month of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three, directed by the law of the State of Virginia, for a member of the House of Representatives of the United States for the district composed of the counties of Botetourt, Rockbridge, Kenawha, Greenbriar, and Monroe, in the western district of Virginia, it appears—

"That, of the polls taken in the county of Botetourt Thomas Lewis had one hundred and fifty-five votes, and Andrew Moore had three hundred and five votes, that, out of the persons who voted for Thomas Lewis, twenty-three were unqualified to vote; and that out of the persons who voted for Andrew Moore, twenty-eight were unqualified to vote.

"That of the polls taken in Rockbridge, Thomas Lewis had sixty-five votes, and Andrew Moore had three hundred and twenty-one votes: that out of the persons who voted for Thomas Lewis, there were four persons unqualified to vote; and out of the persons who voted for Andrew Moore, there were twenty persons unqualified to vote.

"That, of the polls taken in Kenawha county, Thomas Lewis had one hundred and sixty-one votes, and Andrew Moore had one vote: that out of the persons who voted for Thomas Lewis there were ninety persons unqualified to vote.

"That, of the polls taken in Greenbriar, Thomas Lewis had five hundred and thirty-nine votes, and Andrew Moore had one hundred and three votes; that out of the persons who voted for Thomas Lewis two hundred and two were unqualified to vote; and out of the persons who voted for Andrew Moore thirty-two were unqualified to vote.

"That, of the polls taken in Monroe county, Thomas Lewis had eighty-four votes, and Andrew Moore had one hundred and two votes; that out of the persons who voted for Thomas Lewis thirty-six were unqualified to vote; and out of the persons who voted for Andrew Moore, forty-four were unqualified to vote. Hence it appears—"That all the persons who voted for Thomas Lewis in the several counties aforesaid, which compose the western district of the State of Virginia, were one thousand and four; and that all the persons who voted for Andrew Moore in the said counties were eight hundred and thirty-two.

"It further appears, on a deliberate scrutiny, that, of the above votes, three hundred and fifty-five persons voted for Thomas Lewis who were unqualified to vote, and that one hundred and twenty-four voted for Andrew Moore who were unqualified to vote; and that, by deducting the unqualified votes from the votes given for each of the parties at the elections, Thomas Lewis has six hundred and forty-nine good votes, and Andrew Moore has seven hundred and eight good votes, being fifty-nine more than Thomas Lewis. Whereupon,

"Your committee are of opinion that Thomas Lewis, not being duly elected, is not entitled to a seat in this House; and they are further of opinion that Andrew Moore, who has the highest number of votes, after deducting the before-mentioned unqualified votes from the respective polls, is duly elected and entitled to a seat in this House."

Ordered, That the report be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Wednesday next.

"While the committee feel no disposition to express an opinion unfavorable to the prayer of the petitioners, they believe it would be improper to grant it at the present moment. Without presuming to anticipate the course which it may be the interest and policy of the United States to pursue in the disposition of the public lands in the territories west of the Mississippi, they beg leave to recommend that the further consideration of the prayer of the said petition be postponed until the next session of Congress."

The report was agreed to.

The Governor, by and with advice and consent of the said Legislative Council, or of a majority of them, shall have power to alter, modify, or repeal the laws which may be in force at the commencement of this act. Their Legislative powers shall also extend to all the rightful powers of legislation: but no law shall be valid which is inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, or which shall lay any person under restraint, burden, or disability, on account of his religious opinions, professions, or worship; in all which he shall be free to maintain his own, and not burdened for those of another. The Governor shall publish throughout the said Territory all the laws which shall be made, and shall from time to time report the same to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress; which, if disapproved of by Congress, shall thenceforth be of no force. The Governor or Legislative Council shall have no power over the primary disposal of the soil, nor to tax the lands of the United States, nor to interfere with the claims to land within the said Territory. The Governor shall convene and prorogue the Legislative Council, whenever he may deem it expedient. It shall be his duty to obtain all the information in his power in relation to the customs, habits, and dispositions of the inhabitants of the said Territory, and communicate the same, from time to time, to the President of the United States;"

Mr. LEIB observed that he did not like the provisions of this section, and least of all that which gave the Governor the right of proroguing the Legislative Council. It appeared to him that that body was the most dependant thing of its nature in the United States; and when the power of prorogation vested in the Governor was considered, it seemed to him that the people would do much better without any such body. This was a royal appendage which he did not like. He, therefore, moved to strike out the words "and prorogue."

Mr. GREGG said he was not only in favor of the motion of his colleague, but against the section generally. It would require much further amendment to induce him to vote for it. He was opposed to the power it gave the President to appoint the members of the Legislative Council. It appeared to him a mere burlesque to say they shall be appointed by the President. How is the President to get information of the qualifications for office? This could only be obtained from the officers appointed by him, and principally from the Governor, who will not fail to recommend to the President the appointment of persons favorable to his own views. Mr. G. said that they would, therefore, rather vest the appointment of the members of the Legislative Council in the Governor; the mode pointed out in the bill was only calculated to rescue the Governor from the responsibility attached to his office, by dividing it among others. It might, perhaps, in the first institution of the government be difficult to get the Council appointed in any other way. Mr. G. said he had it in contemplation to move an amendment, which, although it would not render the section entirely agreeable to him, would so far remove the objections he entertained against it, as to induce him to vote for it. It would give the President the appointment of the Legislative Council for one year; but direct the Council during that time to lay off the district into counties, and thereupon divest the President of the power, and vest it in the white free male inhabitants of the Territory on the 30th of April last and the citizens of the United States.

By the introduction of this amendment, or of one embracing similar principles, and incorporating the amendments of his colleague, Mr. G. said he should be prevailed upon to vote for the section. It had been suggested to him by some gentlemen that it might be more agreeable to the people of Louisiana, and consonant with our plans of Territorial government, to vest the powers of a Legislative Council, for the first year, in the Governor and Judges, making it their duty to provide for the election of a Council thereafter by the people. It was also intimated that some other gentlemen had prepared different amendments as a substitute to the whole section. When he heard them read, he might, perhaps, prefer them to his own. Mr. G. concluded by moving the amendment stated above.

Mr. LEIB said his amendment did not in the least interfere with that of his colleague, with whom he fully accorded in sentiment.

Mr. VARNUM was of opinion that the section in the bill provided such a kind of Government as had never been known in the United States. He thought sound policy, no less than justice, dictated the propriety of making provision for the election of a Legislative body by the people. There was not only the common obligation of justice imposed upon Congress to do this, but they were bound by treaty. The treaty with France expressly says:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States."

The treaty makes it obligatory on the United States to admit the inhabitants of Louisiana, as soon as possible, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States. In order to decide the principle of this section of the bill by an expression of the sense of the Committee, he would move that the Committee should rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, with the view of refusing them leave, and afterwards referring the bill to a select committee to receive a modification in conformity to the opinions of the House.

Mr. HUGER trusted the Committee would not rise. He knew not the impressions on this subject on the minds of other gentlemen; but the information lately received from Louisiana convinced him of the propriety of proceeding with the bill immediately. In addition to the principles contained in the section under consideration, there were others of great importance. He thought it would be most advisable, in a future stage of discussion, to commit the bill to a select committee, if any material alterations should be made in it. It was best, at present, to deliberate fully on the several provisions of the bill, and for gentlemen to make an interchange of opinions. Were the bill now committed, the report of the committee would not advance the business in the least, as that report might be as objectionable to the House as the bill from the Senate.

Mr. ELLIOT, for like reasons assigned by the gentleman from South Carolina, and for other reasons, hoped the Committee would not rise. He did not believe the section under consideration was, in its present form, consistent either with the spirit of the Constitution or the treaty; but he believed that, by the introduction of a small amendment, the section might be rendered perfectly consistent with them, and the passage of the bill be greatly accelerated. He preferred a middle course between the existing section and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Whatever amendments were necessary would be easily offered and discussed at present; whereas no desirable object could be effected by a reference.

Mr. GREGG said it also appeared to him that no valuable purpose would be answered by referring the bill to a select committee. What can such a committee do? There exists no diversity of sentiment in the House on principle. Some are for giving to the people of the Territory, instead of the President, the power of electing members of the Legislative Council. Here, then, are two distinct principles, and unless the House determine which of them it will adopt, a select committee can do nothing. Let us settle the principle of the bill first, and then refer it to a select committee, to modify it in correspondence with them.

Mr. EUSTIS said this subject was, in his opinion, inferior to no other discussed this session. With regard to the provisions of the section under consideration, it was to be expected that there would be a diversity of opinion. Gentlemen inimical to them had taken different grounds. One gentleman desires the power of the Governor to prorogue the Council to be rescinded; another gentleman wishes an entire change in the formation of the Council; and a third is in favor of the Committee rising, that the bill may go to a select committee to report different provisions for the government of the people of Louisiana from those contained in the bill before us. This motion necessarily brings the principle on which the Council is organized by the bill before us.

It is extremely difficult to form any system of government for this Territory with our ideas of civil liberty under the Constitution of the United States. It appears to me, said Mr. E., that before we determine the principle on which the Council is to be formed, it is necessary distinctly to understand the genius, the manners, the disposition, and the state of the people to be governed. The treaty has been resorted to by my colleague to show that they are entitled to elect their own Legislature. It says:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States."

Are the people of Louisiana admitted into the Union at this time, or not, with all the rights of citizens of the United States? The answer to this inquiry will lead to a right decision of the question under discussion. If they are so admitted, they are entitled to all the rights of citizens of the United States. And if they are thus entitled, there remains another inquiry: are they qualified from habit, and from the circumstances in which they are placed, to exercise these high privileges? If they are both entitled and qualified to enjoy them, we can have no hesitation in pronouncing the bill grounded on a wrong principle, that it ought to be rejected, and another bill, of a far different nature, be introduced in its room. But I do not consider the subject in this light. The people, in my opinion are at present unprepared for, and undesirous of, exercising the elective franchise. The first object of the Government is to hold the country. How? By protecting the people in all their rights, and by administering the Government in such a manner as to prevent any disagreement among them—to use no other term. Suppose the people called upon to choose those who are to make laws for them, does the information we possess justify the belief that this privilege would be so exercised as to conduce to the peace, happiness, and tranquillity of the country? I apprehend not. On the sentiments of the House on this point the decision of this motion must turn.

According to this bill, the Governor and Council are to make the laws. Suppose the Council is in session, and the Governor possess no power to prorogue them. Suppose they should engage in acts subversive of their relation to the United States. Would not this power be of essential utility? It appears to me indispensably necessary that a vein of authority should ascend to the Government of the United States, until the people of the Territory are admitted to the full enjoyment of State rights. From that knowledge of this people which I have been able to acquire, I have formed an opinion that authority should be constantly exercised over them, without severity, but in such a manner as to secure the rights of the United States and the peace of the country.

The government laid down in this bill is certainly a new thing in the United States; but the people of this country differ materially from the citizens of the United States. I speak of the character of the people at the present time. When they shall be better acquainted with the principles of our Government, and shall have become desirous of participating in our privileges, it will be full time to extend to them the elective franchise. Have not the House been informed from an authentic source, since the cession, that the provisions of our institutions are inapplicable to them? If so, why attempt, in pursuit of a vain theory, to extend political institutions to them for which they are not prepared? I am one of those who believe that the principles of civil liberty cannot suddenly be grafted on a people accustomed to a regimen of a directly opposite hue. The approach of such a people to liberty must be gradual. I believe them at present totally unqualified to exercise it. If this opinion be erroneous, then the principles of the bill are unfounded. If, on the contrary, this opinion is sound, it results that neither the power given to the President to appoint the members of the Council, or of the Governor to prorogue them, are unsafe or unnecessary.

The extension of the elective franchise may be considered by the people of Louisiana a burden instead of a benefit. I have understood there is none of that equality among them which exists in the United States; grades are there more highly marked, and they may deem it rather a matter of oppression to extend to them the privileges which we deem inestimable, and with the value of which we have been long familiar.

Before we decide this principle, it is absolutely necessary to consider the relation of these people to the United States. I consider them as standing in nearly the same relation to us as if they were a conquered country. By the treaty they are, it is true, entitled to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages and immunities, of citizens of the United States, and to be incorporated into the Union as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution—but can they be admitted now? Are they at this moment so admitted? If not, they are not entitled to these rights; but if they were, I should doubt the propriety of extending them to them.

If the present provisions of the bill are carried into effect, there will be more security than will arise under the motion of my colleague. It is very natural and honorable to gentlemen of liberal minds to be desirous of extending to this people the privileges enjoyed by our own citizens; but sentiments of this kind, however liberal and praiseworthy, may be carried in the face of facts, and may operate injuriously on those they are intended to benefit. I have thrown out these sentiments for the consideration of the Committee, and if they shall determine in favor of striking out this section I shall consider the decision as equivalent to losing the bill. Upon the whole, as the bill only purports to provide for a temporary government, and as, in the course of a year we shall have more information respecting the country, when it will be in our power, in case such information shall justify it, to extend all the privileges which gentlemen seem so desirous of doing, I hope the Committee will not rise or agree to strike out this section.

Mr. LYON said when he first thought of rising on this subject, it was merely to remind the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HUGER,) and the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. ELLIOT,) that there was no need of the hurry they seemed to think necessary on this occasion, as the bill before us contains a section providing against its going into operation until October next; and to express his hope that the Committee would rise, as there were so many traits in the bill so disgusting to him that he would be willing to send it to any select committee; better it they might, but he thought they could not make it worse. Yet, after having heard the gentleman from Massachusetts advocate the principle of the section under consideration, he could not avoid making a few observations. I think, said Mr. L., that these people have a right, by nature and by treaty, to have some concern in their own government, and, although they may not be completely qualified for self-government, and we may not be willing to put them on the same footing with the people of a free and independent State, I know of no reason why they may not be allowed by their representatives to come before the Governor in an organized way with an expression of their wishes and their wants, and to propose for his adoption laws they may think fitting and salutary for their country. I am not ready to say, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. LEIB,) that I wish to take from the Governor the power of convening and proroguing the Legislative Council or Assembly. I am willing for the present he should have that power, as well as an unqualified negative on their bills. In that case, how can the representatives of that people injure our Government? It is the business of the Governor appointed by the Executive of the Union to watch over them for the interest of the nation—his power will be ample for the protection of that interest. When they ask his assent to those things that are fitting and proper, he will give it, I hope; when they ask it for those things which are not fitting or proper, he will no doubt refuse it; and if they should at any time become troublesome, he will prorogue them, and tell them to go home about their business. I cannot refuse these people, the humble boon, the pitiful specimen of liberty, the laying before their Governor by their representatives, for his consent, the bills they wish passed into laws for their local accommodation, and for their satisfaction with respect to their rights and their property; neither would I mock their feelings by a Legislative Council appointed by the President of the United States. I do not believe he wishes that power. I do not think it fits his character. How is he to divine who it is best to appoint? I would as soon compliment Mr. Bonaparte with that power; I dare say he is better acquainted with the people there. But the gentleman from Massachusetts seems to think these people are not desirous of exercising the power of electing legislative representatives. If that is the case, do we not owe something on this score to principle—to consistency—to the national honor, pledged by treaty? If there is danger on that score, (which I am pretty certain there is not,) let the government be so organized that it can go on without the representatives of those districts who neglect or refuse to elect.

But the most ludicrous idea I have heard expressed on the subject is, that these people must be kept in slavery until they can be learned to think and behave like freemen. "Establish the government proposed, and let them learn under that to enjoy the rights and benefits of freemen." I wonder how much longer this probationary slavery is to last in order to bring about the purpose proposed; for my part, I believe they have had it longer than has done them any good. I really wish to know how much longer this apprenticeship is to continue, and what are the symptoms by which we are to know when slaves are fitted to become freemen. I shall, sir, eventually vote for the Committee's rising, although I am quite willing to hear what farther can be said in favor of this section.

Mr. LUCAS was against the rising of the Committee, inasmuch as the bill under consideration offered the widest field of discussing the subject before them, and inasmuch as it was proper, that the principles of it should be settled by a majority, to enable a select committee to collect the sense of the House. When this decision should have taken place, he should have no objections to a recommitment for the purpose of modifying the bill in consonance with it.

It was known, by the treaty, that the United States are bound to secure to the people of Louisiana as large a portion of liberty and security of rights, as though they remained under the Government of France and Spain; and he trusted the bill as it stood secured to them much more. As an instance, it might be mentioned that the privilege of habeas corpus had never been enjoyed by them while they were connected with either Spain or France. An argument was drawn from the treaty, that these people are to be admitted to the absolute enjoyment of the rights of citizens; but gentlemen would not deny, that the time when, and the circumstances under which this provision of the treaty was to be carried into effect, were submitted to the decision of Congress. It has been remarked, that this bill establishes elementary principles of government never previously introduced in the government of any Territory of the United States. Granting the truth of this observation, it must be allowed that the United States had never before devolved upon them, the making provision for the government of people under such circumstances. Governors must not rest on theory, but must raise their political structures on the state of the people for whom they are made. Mr. Lucas said, that without wishing to reflect on the inhabitants of Louisiana, he would say that they are not prepared for a government like that of the United States. Governed by Spanish officers, exercising authority according to their whim, supported by a military force, it could not be said that a people thus inured to despotism, were prepared on a sudden to receive the principles of our Government. It was questionable whether there was a nation in Europe whom these principles would be so advantageous to as they are to us. It would be recollected by gentlemen, who so strenuously advocated the abstract principle of right, that the people of Louisiana have not been consulted in the act of cession to this country, but had been transferred by a bargain made over their heads. It was a proof this act had not been received with approbation by them, that when they saw the American flag hoisted in the room of the French, they shed tears; this was a proof that they were not so friendly to our Government as some gentlemen imagined. He was persuaded the people of the Mississippi Territory would not have acted in this manner. There is no doubt but that after they shall have experienced the blessings of a free Government, they will wonder at their having shed tears on this occasion; but they must, in the first instance, feel these blessings.

Mr. Lucas said he was fully of opinion with the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EUSTIS) in the sentiments he had expressed. The United States had it eminently in their power to make these people happy without an extension to them of all our privileges. They will not be gratified from knowing that the theory of liberty is extended to them, but from its practical effects. The people of Louisiana know but little of political theories, but they will feel the just operation of equal laws; and if they can obtain practical justice, though it may not arise from an extension of our elementary political principles, they will not find fault with it.

Mr. Lucas said he was not among those who considered the bill, in all its provisions, perfect. He considered it susceptible of much amendment; though not in the principle now under review.

In this provision, by declaring that the inhabitants of the Territory shall compose the Legislative Council, a great point is gained by the people. For it cannot be supposed that the inhabitants, thus called upon to discharge high duties to society, will so far lose sight of their own permanent interest as to sacrifice them, together with the good of the country, to whim or corruption.

Their election by the President is another important security. Suppose the Governor shall wish to render the Council his puppets. The President will not feel an interest in gratifying his improper views. It is, however, said that his information will be derived from the Governor. But, the fact is, he will receive it in part from the Governor, and in part from others; and he will be sagacious enough to judge, not from a part, but from the whole that reaches him.

A valuable effect will flow from composing the Council of the inhabitants of the country; its members will thereby be initiated in the theory of our Government and laws, and this knowledge will hereafter qualify them for higher political trusts; they will acquire much political knowledge; they will return home, and their conversation with their friends will naturally turn on political topics, and on the laws they have passed; thus will a spirit of inquiry and of political discussion spring up in the country. When this effect shall be produced, it will be time, and only then, to give them a government as liberal and free as that contemplated by the amendment.

Mr. MACON (Speaker) observed that he coincided in opinion with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. VARNUM,) whose object would, he thought, be better tried by a motion to strike out the section. This motion would bring the principle before the House. If the section should be stricken out the bill would be recommitted for new modification to a select committee. Mr. M. accordingly moved to strike out the fourth section.

This motion having been stated from the Chair, Mr. MACON again rose. I will endeavor, said he, to compress my ideas on this point in a few words. My first objection to the principle contained in the section is, that it establishes a species of government unknown to the laws of the United States. We have three descriptions of Government; that of the Union, that of the States, and Territorial governments. I believe the Territorial government, as established by the ordinance of the Old Congress, the best adapted to the circumstances of the people of Louisiana; and that it may be so modified as best to promote their convenience. The people residing in the Mississippi Territory, are now under this kind of government. Is it not likely that the people of Louisiana will expect the same form of government and laws with their neighbors; and is it not desirable for the general peace and happiness that there should be a correspondence between them? If they are as ignorant as some gentlemen represent them, (and of this I know nothing,) will they not expect the same grade of government with the inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory, with whom they will have a constant intercourse? Although they lived previously under the Spanish Government, and although their number did not entitle them, when formed into a Territory, to the second grade of government, no inconvenience resulted. It is said, in reply to this observation; that a large number of inhabitants of that Territory were Americans. It is true that many of them were native Americans, but some also were Spanish.

The simple question is, what kind of government is most fitted to this people? It is extremely difficult to legislate for a people with whose habits and customs we are unacquainted. I, for one, declare myself unacquainted with them; nor would I in fixing the government, unless for the safety of the Union, do an act capable of disgusting the people for whom it is adopted. It will be a wise policy to avoid whatever is calculated to disgust them. My opinion is that they will be better satisfied with an old-established form of government, than with a new one. Why? Because they have seen it established in the adjacent Territory of Mississippi, and know the manner in which it operates. If there are bad men in Louisiana, will anything be more easy than to disgust the people against the General Government by showing that they have given one kind of government to the people of the Mississippi Territory, and a different kind to them? In my mind, it is sound policy to give them no cause of complaint. We ought to show them that we consider them one people.

I will not pretend to say that the people of Louisiana are prepared for a State government, which differs most materially from a Territorial government. The best way to prepare them for such a government, is to take the system already known to our laws; one grade or the other of the Territorial government. For myself, I would prefer the adoption of the second grade, but I would prefer the first to any new system. For these reasons, I hope the section will be struck out, and the bill referred to a select committee.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said he would submit a few reasons in favor of the motion to strike out the section. As the hour was late, he would endeavor to compress his observations in as narrow a compass as possible. The principal question is, whether we shall give the inhabitants of Louisiana the right of self-government, or even the hope that they will hereafter enjoy the benefits of self-government, and of those rights which there is no doubt but that they conceive themselves entitled to under the treaty with France? In examining this question, it may be proper to take a brief notice of the section proposed to be stricken out, and the degree of liberty it is calculated to give the inhabitants of Louisiana. On examining the section, it will appear that it really establishes a complete despotism; that it does not evince a single trait of liberty; that it does not confer one single right to which they are entitled under the treaty; that it does not extend to them the benefits of the Federal Constitution, or declare when, hereafter, they shall receive them. I believe it will, on investigation, be found difficult to separate liberty from the right of self-government; and hence arises the question, now to be decided, whether we shall countenance the principle of governing by despotic systems of government, or support the principle that they are entitled to be governed by laws made by themselves, and to expect that they shall, in due time, receive all the benefits of citizens of the United States under the Constitution.

By the section all Legislative power is vested in a Governor and thirteen Counsellors, appointed by the President. The people have no share in their choice. The members of the Council are only to aid the Governor; they have no right to make laws themselves; the words of the section are:

"The Governor, by and with advice and consent of the said Legislative Council, or of a majority of them, shall have power to alter, modify, or repeal the laws which may be in force at the commencement of this act."

That is, the Governor makes the laws by and with the advice of the Council. They are not to deliberate on what shall be law; but he, like some ancient potentates, is to suggest to them what, in his opinion, is proper to be law. This is the proper construction of this section, or I do not understand it. "He is to make," &c. They are not to make the laws, and submit them to him for his approbation. He makes them, and asks his creatures whether they will agree or not agree to them. I hope we are not prepared to establish such a system as this.

If, then, the proposed system be despotic, it is proper, in the next place, to inquire why it is erected over the people of Louisiana? Is their condition such as not to qualify them for the enjoyment of any of the blessings of liberty? Are they blind to the difference between liberty and slavery? Are they insensible to the difference of laws made by themselves, and of laws made by others? We have no evidence that this is the case. If we retrace the progress of liberty among other nations, I would ask gentlemen where they find reason for the opinion that the people of Louisiana are unfitted for the enjoyment of its blessings? They will find that it has, in many cases, arisen among people far less enlightened. I trust, therefore, we shall not determine that because the people of that country have not investigated the full value of a free Government, they are not qualified to enjoy any freedom. I ask gentlemen, when they talk of the abuse of the elective franchise, to point out a solitary instance where the people have abused the rights they acquired under it? They will find it hard to point out one. Whereas I ask them for a single instance, in the annals of mankind, where despotism has not been abused. This they will find it equally difficult to adduce. One principle cannot be denied: When power is vested in the people, they exercise it for their own benefit, and to the best of their skill. They have no object in abusing it; for they are sure to be the first victims of its improper exercise. I ask, then, where is the danger of placing in the hands of the people the right of choosing those who are to regulate their own internal concerns? Surely, when gentlemen depicted the great danger of this investiture of power, they did not consider that the very act before us, subjects all laws to the control of Congress, and that in all cases wherein Congress shall negative them, they will have no validity. Where, then, is the danger? Will it be injurious to the United States that the Legislature of the Territory, chosen by the people, should make laws for their own accommodation, without prejudice to the Union? It cannot. I feel surprised when gentlemen say, we ought to be cautious in giving power, lest it should be used in opposition to the interests of the Union. How can this be, when this Government has the appointment of all the officers, and particularly the Governor and judges; and when to the Legislature is only confided the management of internal concerns? When they have no authority to form connexions with foreign Powers, or to form any coalition with their neighbors, in opposition to the measures of the General Government? If the people are already hostile to the United States, it is evident that it is not the severity of despotism that will make them friendly. I ask, how are we to account for this change? Not long since, this people were congratulated on their releasement from a despotic Government, and were invited into the arms of a Government ready to extend to them all the blessings of self-government. Now we are about to damp all their hopes, and to send forth a few creatures to lash them with despotism, to make all their laws. We go further. We do not even hold forth the idea that, at a future day, they shall make their own laws. Our language is, if, notwithstanding the despotism we extend over you, like good subjects, you patiently bear your chains, we may withdraw them, and let you govern yourselves. If this is not the amount of the language of gentlemen, I do not comprehend it.

FEBRUARY, 1804.

Louisiana Territory.

H. OF R.

It is stated by a gentleman from Massachusetts, that it is difficult to form a government for such a people; and that it is necessary previously to consider the habits and manners of the people to be governed. I am sorry, at this enlightened day of the world, to hear arguments in favor of despotism, so often used before. How does a despot govern his subjects? He tells them, and makes them believe, that they are ignorant and unqualified to govern themselves; considering their ignorance, he tells them he does them a favor by governing them, and they have nothing to do but to obey. This is the doctrine on which monarchy and despotism rise; as it prevails, despotism prevails, and in proportion as it is destroyed, the principle of liberty prevails. Let us not say, the people are too ignorant to govern themselves. No. Give them an opportunity, and they will acquire knowledge, at least sufficient to make a proper choice of those best qualified to superintend their public concerns. This will act as a stimulus to those who expect to be chosen, to make themselves qualified. But I never knew, before this day, that for a people to be fit for the enjoyment of liberty, they must, for a certain time, be under the scourge of despotism.

The same gentleman inquires, in case the elective franchise shall be extended, what hold we shall have on the people of Louisiana? This inquiry is readily answered; we shall have power to reject all laws they may make; and a Governor appointed by us, will have the nomination of all military and civil officers, who administer the Government. If this is not a hold and check upon them I know not what is. While examining this point, it may not be improper to inquire, what is the best way of making these people most attached to the United States; and whether that end will be answered best by denying them all liberty, and by making a radical difference between their Government and that of territories similarly situated with themselves. Let me for once observe, that it is the true policy of this Government to conciliate the people to us, to our manners and laws; to show them, that considering them as a part of the Union, they have a right to expect the enjoyment of privileges unknown to them before; instead of disappointing their hopes and compelling them to serve a long quarantine before they are admitted to a participation of those rights which we ourselves possess.

It has been intimated that these people are unfit to govern themselves, but I am acquainted with no information that warrants this inference. I believe that information of a different nature derived from other gentlemen, is more to be relied on, because those who give it are better informed. As to their interests I cannot conceive what can have rendered them so different from those of the people of the Mississippi Territory; they were once the same people and under the same Government, and they could not have then become unfit for self-government. The best information assures us that a considerable proportion of the population is composed of American citizens, amounting perhaps to one-fourth or one-fifth of the whole. There are also many British subjects, not so ignorant as to be entirely insensible to the benefits of a free Government.

Is there, too, anything in the Spanish Government whose effects are so degrading as to disqualify a man from enjoying freedom? If this were the case it would have been an argument against accepting the country at all. Have we not, however, understood that this great measure has been effected with a double view of accommodating the United States and benefitting the people of Louisiana, by extending to them the advantages of a free Government? Shall we consider ourselves at liberty to barter them, to view them as cattle, and govern them as such? I hope not. Let us look at the treaty and attend to its language. It says, "The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the meantime they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty,

'property, and the religion which they profess.'" By the very act before us, a number of the laws of the United States are extended to them; by this the principle is admitted that the rights, advantages, and immunities, can, according to the Constitution, be extended to them. If they can be so extended, it becomes a question of policy altogether, how far they shall be extended. Is it then politic, or not, at this time to extend the privileges they are entitled to as a Territory of the United States? One idea relied on by gentlemen is worthy of notice; it takes for granted that the people do not wish for a free Government. I ask gentlemen if they are really serious in this remark? If they are, the argument will be conclusive in giving them, if they choose it, an absolute despotism. If we knew it were the desire of the people to have a King, whatever might be our opinions of the benefits of liberty, it would be our duty to give them one! Gentlemen cannot think so, nor would they suffer the United States to degrade their character by such an act. I conceive the United States bound to give them a republican form of Government, and to consider therefore not what they may desire, but what will best suit their ultimate interest, while it promotes the benefit of America at large. One gentleman observes, that we ought to regard the people of Louisiana as totally distinct from, and as not possessed of any similar habits with ourselves. I trust, however, we shall consider them as a part of the human species. I believe the gentleman will find the human character the same in different parts of the globe. If this principle had been pursued, liberty had never flourished; if the people had never enjoyed liberty till they were ripe for it, how many ages of darkness would have passed away! But the fact is, the people suffer oppression to an astonishing degree—despotism grinds them down till human nature can endure no more, and then they break their chains in a revolt. I therefore can see no force in the argument of waiting till they are ripe for liberty. How ripe? If they have never tasted its benefits how can they know them? I trust, therefore, we shall extend to them the same rights as are enjoyed by the other Territories. I will close what I have to say on this subject with a few additional remarks. Much has been said of the interests of the people, to prove them incapable of exercising the elective franchise. I will only observe, in addition to what I have already stated, that I believe that principle was the first made use of among nations. We find it among savage nations, and we find all nations, even in the darkest periods, exercising it, until deprived of their liberties by one or a few designing and ambitious characters. Should the Committee agree to strike out this section, it is my wish to propose an amendment similar in substance to the provisions established in the Mississippi Territory. I will not take up the time of the Committee with reading the rough draught which I have drawn to this effect, but barely state that my object is to empower the Governor and judges to execute the government until they shall divide the Territory, and until the people choose their own Legislature. I trust, therefore, the Committee will agree to strike out the section, and that it shall not hereafter be said, that we met to make laws for a people, whom we have called our friends and brothers, different from the laws which we have made for ourselves.

Messrs. ELMER and LEIB, supported, and Mr. HUGER opposed this motion; when the Committee rose, without any question being taken, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, February 29.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the twentieth instant, the memorial of William Eaton, made a report thereon; which was read, and the consideration thereof postponed until Friday next.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill providing for the expenses of the civil government of Louisiana; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

An engrossed bill to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "An act for the relief of the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EPES, from the committee appointed, presented a bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of Virginia, therein mentioned; which was read twice and ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

Ordered, That the depositions and other papers transmitted from several counties in the State of Virginia, respecting a contested election of Thomas Lewis, one of the members returned to serve in this House, which were referred to a Committee of Elections, during the present session, be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the twenty-fourth instant, the report of the Committee of Elections in the case of the said contested election.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill altering the days of session of the district court for the district of Virginia; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating a letter stating certain fraudulent practices for monopolizing lands in Louisiana, The Message, and the letter transmitted therewith, were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JACKSON moved the going into Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Elections, respecting the seat of Thomas Lewis.

Mr. DANA moved a postponement of this order until to-morrow, and required the yeas and nays, which were yeas 64, nays 48.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for carrying into effect the convention of the 11th August, 1802, between the United States and the King of Spain.

The bill appropriates $15,760 for the compensation of two Commissioners, half of the fifth Commissioner, a secretary, and an agent.

Having passed through the Committee, the House ordered the bill to a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. EPPES, from the committee appointed to inquire whether the moneys drawn from the Treasury on account of the Marine Corps have been faithfully applied to the public service, made a report, which concludes with recommending a resolution, that provision ought to be made by law for a monthly or quarterly adjustment of the accounts of the Marine Corps.

GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

The House went again into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the government of Louisiana.

The fourth section of the bill being under consideration—

Mr. JACKSON said: As this section is the corner stone on which the whole superstructure rests, and involves the most important principle of the bill, I will ask the indulgence of the Committee to make a few remarks upon it. It presents two important questions; first, Whether it is proper on the broad principle of political justice to adopt it? And secondly, Whether it is consistent with our treaty with France? Two questions arise out of the first proposition; first, Is the system consonant to the habits of a free people? And, secondly, if not, is it the best calculated to advance the happiness of those who have never tasted the blessings of liberty? The first question requires no discussion; it will be answered in the negative by every section of this Union. Every section has been engaged in forming a constitution, and both the State and Federal constitutions have decided this point in the negative, because neither partake of the aristocratical or monarchical features contained in this section. The question remains to be considered whether it is best calculated for those who have never enjoyed the blessings of liberty. Gentlemen say it is, because the people are hostile to the enjoyment of the blessings of self-government, and the gentleman from South Carolina thinks we ought to look upon them as a certain portion of the people among us—meaning those in slavery—and to treat them as such.

Mr. HUGER explained. He said his meaning was not such as the gentleman's language implied; he spoke of them barely by way of comparison, to show that nothing was more dangerous than to pass from the extreme of slavery to perfect liberty.

Mr. JACKSON.—I will not pretend to say I comprehended the meaning of the gentleman; his words were, "they ought to be looked upon as a certain portion of people among us and treated as such." If he did not allude to slaves, I do not know to whom he did allude. But as he says he did not allude to them, I will avoid any remarks that go to implicate him in such allusion. Admitting they are not to be compared to the slaves of the Southern States, or to those human beings who are made the subject of traffic, gentlemen allege that a system of free government will be inconvenient to them. I believe they are wrong in this position, and that man is the same, whether born in the United States or on the banks of the Ganges, under an African sun or on the banks of the Mississippi, and that a love of liberty is implanted in his nature. If the gentleman from South Carolina meant to impress a belief on the Committee, or is under the influence of that belief himself, that the inhabitants of Louisiana are exclusively subjects of France or Spain, he is mistaken. A great number of the inhabitants are Americans. Emigration has been carried to a great extent; many have gone from the West, from the East, and from the middle States; and I will ask gentlemen, whether those persons who have carried with them the habits of Americans, are not fit objects of free government? Surely they are; and yet these must be excluded from the benefits of self-government, if this bill pass in its present shape. I flatter myself that great good will result to the United States, and to the political system we support, by the introduction of Americans into that country; they will explain to the natives and to those who have emigrated from Europe, the nature and principles of our Government; the language of liberty will captivate them; its principles are just, and will be omnipotent, and in receiving a free system of government from the United States, they will feel a sentiment of gratitude instead of abhorrence.

Allow, for the sake of argument, that the people are slaves. This does not prove that they are not fit objects of a free Government. Look at the ensanguined plains of St. Domingo; the oppressed have there broken their chains, and resumed their long lost rights. The example proves more than a volume. There, notwithstanding the great debasement of the human character, the sacred fire of liberty is not extinguished. Wherever it exists, sooner or later, it bursts forth into an irresistible flame, and consumes everything opposed to it. And are the subjects of a monarchy, the inhabitants of Louisiana, more deficient in manly sentiment than the people of St. Domingo? This argument of incompetency in the people to govern themselves, is the essence of despotism; its language is, the people are a mob; a swinish multitude; and the Divine Goodness has pleased to send into the world kings and nobles to keep them in order. A language well suited to bold and ambitious spirits, but which, thank God! the American people know how to estimate.

One gentleman, in the course of his remarks, in order to show that the people of Louisiana are not qualified for self-government, has informed us they shed tears at the lowering of the French flag, and the hoisting of ours in its room. Perhaps they were not unfriendly tears, but tears of joy; perhaps those who shed them were sycophants of Mr. Laussat, and they were shed to gratify him. At all events, whether they laughed or cried, I am unwilling to form a judgment of the character of the people from the conduct of a few persons at

New Orleans, who, from proximity and the nature of a despotic government, felt themselves obliged to weep, to smile, or dress their faces in sunshine, as the occasion prompted, through fear of the inquisition or incarceration for life.

But gentlemen say, men of information who have been amongst them are convinced they are not qualified to receive a free government; that it would indeed disgust them: I believe, however, that this impression has been founded on the same ex parte views. Persons going to New Orleans, where despotism rages with unbounded sway, beholding a few persons around the despot, ready to sacrifice everything to his caprice, are not proper to give a character to several hundred thousand people. I believe, if the interior of the country be explored, among those who have heretofore been subjects of Spain and France, we shall find many desirous of receiving civil and religious liberty, and as opposite to the fawning sycophants at New Orleans, as light from darkness. We were told some time since, that Mr. Laussat could not obtain the cession of the country, so great was the hatred of the people to France, and their love of Spain. But in a short time we perceive this hatred turned into affection, so ardent as to produce extreme distress at the transfer of the country to America from France, after but a few days possession. If this statement be true, and the people are so versatile, we may predict that they will be as soon attached to us, and as willing to receive a free system of Government as they were lately enamored of slavery.

It is urged by gentlemen, that we ought to give to this people liberty by degrees. I believe, however, there is no danger of giving them too much of it; and I am unwilling to tarnish the national character by sanctioning the detestable calumny that man is not fitted for freedom. What will the world say if we sanction this principle? They will say we possess the principle of despotism under the garb of Republicans; and that we are insincere, with whatever solemnity we may declare it, in pronouncing all men equal. They will tell us that we have emphatically declared to the American people and to the world, in our first act evincive of emancipation from the tyranny of England, that all men are equal; and that all Governments derive their rightful power from the consent of the governed; and that notwithstanding, when the occasion offers, we exercise despotic power, under the pretext that the people are unable to govern themselves.

I come now to the second question; Is it consistent with the treaty, for the performance of which we have pledged our faith, to withhold from the people of Louisiana the privileges of free government?

The article on this point is in these words:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the meantime they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

A gentleman from Massachusetts, who advocated this section, asserted that the treaty does not apply, because the people are not yet admitted into the Union; but what does the treaty say? "The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible," &c.—As soon as possible, not as soon as conveniently can be admitted; there is no such limitation; and unless gentlemen can make it appear impossible to admit them to a participation of rights, anterior to their admission into the Union as an integral part of it, this provision does require the extension of political rights to them, unless contrary to the Constitution. Cannot we do this under the Constitution? We certainly can—it is not denied that we have the right and possess the power to authorize the people to elect their own magistrates; and as this is not inconsistent with the principles of the Constitution, we are bound to admit them "to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States." Upon the whole, whether we view the subject on the principle of policy, so far as it respects the propriety of extending the principle of free government to this people, or so far as respects the treaty, to the execution of which we have pledged our faith, I have no hesitation in saying, that policy no less than moral obligation dictates the establishment of a system of government different from that contained in the fourth section. I shall, therefore, most cheerfully vote for striking it out.

Mr. HOLLAND.—As my ideas are very different from those of the gentleman who has preceded me, and as I do not believe that either policy or moral obligation recommends the adoption of a system such as he has avowed to be proper, I will, in a few words, state the sentiments I entertain. I do not view this discussion as involving the question, whether the people of Louisiana shall be admitted into the United States. The only question is, whether we shall extend to them the right of free suffrage in its fullest extent, and such as is enjoyed by the people of the United States? Gentlemen in favor of striking out this section, seem impressed with the idea that every gentleman friendly to the section is in favor of an absolute despotism—is inimical to their rights, is desirous of making the people of Louisiana slaves. They take the ground that, if we deny them this right, we deny them everything. But there is a wide difference between denying them the privilege of election and extending to them other high privileges; more, perhaps, than they are capable of enjoying. This law will extend to them the privileges of twenty-one acts of the United States, to which the freemen of the United States are subject. Is this nothing? Gentlemen say they ought not to be subjected but to laws of their own making; but the whole frame of this bill contradicts the assertion, as it principally consists in imposing laws which the people never made, or ought to participate in making. Will the gentleman take the broad ground that people should never be governed but by laws of their own making? This is, indeed, the amount of the argument, and proving too much, it proves nothing. Mr. H. said he believed the people of St. Domingo, who had been alluded to, not qualified to support a free government—not possessed of sufficient knowledge. People who never had an opportunity to obtain knowledge cannot be supposed to possess it, and no kind of knowledge was more difficult to obtain than that which qualified men to be legislators. Can gentlemen conceive the people of Louisiana, who have just thrown off their chains, qualified to make laws? Under the late system the people had no concern in the government, and it was even criminal for them to concern themselves with it; they were set at a distance from the government, and all required from their hands was, to be passive and obedient. Can it be supposed such a people made the subject of Government their study, or can it be presumed they know anything about the principles of the Constitution of the United States? Would persons thus elected be of any service to the Government? So far from being an assistance they would be an encumbrance. Why then impose this burden upon them? The object of this bill is to extend the laws of the United States over Louisiana, not to enable the people of Louisiana to make laws. This extension, so far from being an act of despotism, will be an important privilege. If the laws of the United States were founded in injustice they might have some right to complain, but we only apply to them laws by which we ourselves consent to be governed. Gentlemen say, if we deny the right of self-government, we deny everything; but before they are permitted to make laws, ought they not to understand what law is? If we give power to the people, will they not choose persons as ignorant as themselves? It is a fact that many of the most respectable characters in the country conceive the principle of self-government a mere bubble, and they will not consider themselves aggrieved if it is not extended to them. Does the history of nations show that all men are capable of self-government? No such thing. It shows that none but an enlightened and virtuous people are capable of it; and if the people of Louisiana are not sufficiently enlightened, they are not yet prepared to receive it. If this be the case, the arguments of gentlemen are inconclusive. They are not prepared for self-government. For what are they prepared? To remain in a passive state, and to receive the blessings of good laws; and receiving these, they have no reason to complain.

The provisions of this section are said to be worse than those of the first grade of Territorial governments; but this is incorrect. This plan is not equal to the second grade, but it is certainly superior to the first grade. The first grade gives the Governor and judges all the powers granted by this section; and this section, in addition to the Governor and judges, contemplates the appointment of thirteen counsellors. Is not this preferable to giving the whole power to the Governor and judges?

When the people understand the value of laws equally and impartially administered, and begin to feel an attachment to the United States, and to inquire into the principles of free government, it will be time enough to give them the elective franchise.

Mr. SLOAN.—Mr. Chairman, although silent, I have not been an inattentive spectator of the business now before the House. I was, yesterday, about to rise to express my disapprobation of the section now under consideration, and my concern on hearing sentiments adduced in support of its principle—which I consider as repugnant to justice and sound policy as frost is to fire, or darkness to light—when my friend from Tennessee (Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL) rose, and in so clear and explicit a manner opposed the bill, and exposed its unjust, impolitic, dangerous, and despotic principle, that nothing appeared necessary to be added; after which, I flattered myself no further attempts would be made to support a principle subversive of the inalienable rights of man, but, to my surprise, I hear a repetition of sentiments urged in favor of this principle!

Here let me ask, can anything be more repugnant to the principles of just government; can anything be more despotic, than for a President to appoint a Governor and Legislative Council, the Governor having a negative on all their acts, and power to prorogue them at pleasure? What liberty, what power is here vested in the people? But, perhaps, I may be told that, in the present case, this power will be delegated to one who will not abuse it. This bears no weight with me. None have a higher esteem and respect for the superior talents, integrity, and justice of our present Chief Magistrate than I; but I can never consent to delegate that power to a just person, which an unjust person, who may succeed him, may use for oppressive and tyrannical purposes.

Perhaps I may be also told, that I am ignorant of the situation of the people—I acknowledge it. I only know their situation from printed narrative, and historical or verbal accounts, and probably the greater part of the members of the present House are equally ignorant. But, Mr. Chairman, the only thing I want to know, to decide the present question, is, are they human beings possessed of rational understanding? If so, give them an opportunity to improve it.

But we have been told, that giving these people their just rights will make them enemies dangerous to Government; enable them to combine together, &c. This is, in my opinion, not supported by a single fact, either ancient or modern. That to make the situation of rational beings better, will render them enemies to their benefactors, is as impossible as for streams to turn backward to their source, flames to descend, or sparks cease to fly upwards.

Here, Mr. Chairman, permit me to ask what danger can possibly arise from allowing them the elective franchise? Every law must be sanctioned by the Governor, under the control of Congress. Thus circumscribed, what power have they? I answer, being elected in different, and some of them from distinct districts, they will consequently have knowledge of the various situations of the people, and form a proper medium through which to convey an account of grievances, and information of whatever subjects require Legislative interposition—which, I trust, would be strictly attended to by the Governor. And all laws made for the promotion of their peace and prosperity, sanctioned by the Government, would bind them to the United States, by the strongest of all ties, gratitude and love.

For the foregoing reasons I shall vote for striking out the section, in order that one may be introduced allowing them the elective franchise—which I consider not only as their inherent and inalienable right, but as a right we are bound to give them to fulfill the treaty of cession—and without which, neither the present, nor any other bill, depriving any description of free white citizens of what I consider an inalienable right, shall ever have my vote.

Mr. SMILE said it was not his purpose to detain the House by any detailed observations. His ideas differed in some respects from those expressed by gentlemen on both sides of the question. The subject of liberty was so grateful a theme that gentlemen, desirous of speaking, could not wish a better. All the arguments, however, which had been uttered as to the right of man to self-government, were, in his opinion, irrelevant to the present occasion. He could not agree with gentlemen who considered man, in every situation, as capable of enjoying all the blessings of free Government. The universal experience of the world disproved it. History informs us of many nations, once possessed of free Governments, who afterward became incapable of enjoying them. If this be the case, we may suppose those who never enjoyed liberty, incapable of enjoying it to the same extent as those who have had a long experience of its blessings. Whether the people of Louisiana are qualified to enjoy all the blessings of free Government, I have my doubts. But, I do not, said Mr. S., see the danger of extending to them, ill-informed as they may be supposed to be, the elective franchise, while under the immediate control of the Government of the United States, as they necessarily must be. We ought to discriminate between the situation of a people forming a government for themselves, over which there is no external control, and the situation of a people whose power is under a controlling government. This is an important consideration. I ask, where will be the danger, or the capacity of their doing anything injurious to the United States, provided we give them the elective privilege? They will only be empowered to pass laws for the management of their own internal concerns, and even in these they may be controlled by the United States. Two of the departments of the government will still remain in the hands of the Government of the Union. The Executive power will be amenable to the President, as well as the military. The Government of the United States will retain in their own hands the purse and the sword. Where, then, can be the danger of trusting the people with the exercise of the elective franchise? To me there appears to be none. As I take it for granted that there is but one opinion as to the propriety of bestowing every blessing consistent with the provisions of the Federal Constitution, I think there can be no difficulty in striking out this section, and amending it so as to render its provisions more consonant with what appears to be the disposition of the Committee.

Mr. BOYLE said he should not have risen on this occasion but for the impression that some arguments of weight had been omitted, or had not been sufficiently dwelt on. In the few remarks he purposed to make, he should endeavor to avoid a repetition of ideas already expressed. It was not so much to the novelty, as to the nature of the plan of government contained in the fourth section, that he was opposed. He did not consider the Territorial government proposed to be substituted, as perfect, but he believed it infinitely preferable to that contemplated in the bill. Preferring, therefore, either grade to this, said Mr. B., I shall concur in supporting the substitution of the second grade as most fitted to the circumstances of the people of Louisiana. I feel peculiarly hostile to the mode of appointing the Legislative Council. The power of appointing them is unnecessarily vested in the President. Waiving all objection arising from the distance of the President from the men to be appointed; from the necessity of his relying on the representations of others as to their qualifications, and his liability to be deceived by misrepresentations; still one objection remains, which, to my mind, is most important. I am, said Mr. B., unwilling to extend Executive patronage beyond the line of irresistible necessity. For, I believe, if ever this country is to follow the destiny of other nations, this destiny will be accelerated by the overwhelming torrent of Executive patronage. I feel as high a veneration for the present Chief Magistrate as any man on this floor. Early attached to him, I have retained the full force of my regard for him. But, were he an angel, instead of a man, I would not clothe him with this power. Because, in my estimation, the investiture of such high powers is unnecessary. My opinion is, that they will be more properly exercised by the people. To give them to the President is to furnish a dangerous precedent for extending Executive power and patronage; and as he has himself said, one precedent in favor of power is stronger than a hundred against it, I am in favor of giving to the people all that portion of self-government and independence which is compatible with the Constitution. To this I consider them entitled, as well on natural principle as by the terms of the treaty. When the British Parliament passed the celebrated declaratory act, we declared to the world our right of being governed by laws of our own making. If this right was then, as we declared it, an inalienable and indefeasible right, is it less so now? If it was our indefeasible right, is it not likewise the indefeasible right of every individual of the human species?

But, it is said, the people of Louisiana are not capable of self-government. This assertion must be founded either on the incapacity of the people to choose fit Representatives, or on their inability to find men properly qualified for Representatives. It is unnecessary, on this point, to go into detail. For the section under consideration presupposes the existence of men of sufficient talents to discharge Legislative functions. The President is bound to limit his appointments to persons who have resided one year in Louisiana. The only question is, whether the people are capable of making a discreet choice of Representatives? Wisdom and virtue are the qualifications of a legislator. Abstractly considered, these qualities are inscrutable; but, in particular individuals, they become objects of sense, visible to the most ignorant. And, from a happy ordinance of nature, the most ignorant and wicked are bound to venerate talents and virtue wherever they are found. As what has been said by a celebrated writer on this subject will be more conclusive, and carry with it more weight than anything I can urge, I will quote his words:

FEBRUARY, 1804.

Louisiana Territory.

H. OF R.

"The people are extremely well qualified for choosing those whom they are to entrust with part of their authority. They have only to be determined by things to which they cannot be strangers, and by facts that are obvious to sense. They can tell when a person has fought many battles, and been crowned with success; they are, therefore, very capable of electing a general," &c.—Montesquieu.

This distinguished writer does not, in these remarks, allude to particular people, living under a free Government, but refers to mankind in general, in all climates and ages. If, then, there can be no want of men qualified to legislate, and no want of discernment in the people to select them, no objection can arise to conferring the right of self-government, so far as consistent with the Constitution and our national sovereignty.

It is said, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the people of Louisiana stand in the same relation to us as if we had obtained the country by conquest. If so, we ought to operate upon them more by the influence of love than fear. It will be acknowledged, on all hands, that the exercise of power must be modified by the terms of the cession; and the treaty stipulates that:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and, in the meantime, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

Not content with having provided for their incorporation, inasmuch as the period of incorporation could not be precisely fixed by an express engagement, it provided that, until that period, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess. If by liberty is meant doing that which the laws do not prohibit, then it is immaterial what kind of government be given them; but if, by liberty, it be understood that they shall not be bound by laws to which they have not consented, it is essential that there be given a form of government in which they shall either participate by themselves or through their Representatives. For these reasons, I have no hesitation in declaring, that my vote shall be in favor of striking out the section, and adopting in the place of it one or the other of the grades of Territorial government, or something similar to them.

Messrs. ELLIOT, OLIN, and ELMER supported; and Messrs. S. L. MITCHILL, and LUCAS opposed the motion to strike out the fourth section, made with the view of extending to the people of Louisiana the elective franchise; when the question was put, and the motion to strike out carried—yeas 80, nays 15.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL offered the following substitute:

"The Governor and Judges, or a majority of them, shall adopt and publish in the said Territory, such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary and best suited to the circumstances of the Territory, and may also make such laws as they shall deem conducive to the good Government of the inhabitants thereof, and report the same to Congress from time to time, which laws shall be in force in the said Territory until the organization of the General Assembly therein, unless disapproved of by Congress, but afterwards the Legislature shall have authority to repeal or alter them as they shall think fit.

"The Governor or Judges, or a majority of them, shall, as soon as may be, after they are appointed and commissioned, divide the said Territory into — divisions, to be called counties, in such manner as may best suit the convenience of the inhabitants, each county to contain, as nearly as may be consistent with the nature of the settlements, an equal number of free persons; and the city of New Orleans shall form one county.

"Previous to the organization of the General Assembly, the Governor shall appoint such magistrates, and other civil officers, in each county of the said Territory, as he shall find necessary for the preservation of the peace and good order in the same; after the General Assembly shall be organized, the powers and duties of the magistrates and other civil officers shall be regulated and defined by the said Assembly; but all magistrates and other civil officers, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, shall, during the continuance of this temporary Government, be appointed by the Governor.

"The General Assembly, or Legislature, shall consist of a Legislative Council and a House of Representatives: the House of Representatives shall consist of — members, of whom — shall be chosen from the county, including the city of New Orleans, and — from each of the other counties in the said Territory; a majority of whom shall be a quorum to do business.

"No person shall be eligible or qualified to act as a representative except a free white male, who shall have been a citizen of one of the United States, or of one of the Territories, heretofore belonging to the United States, three years, and be a resident in the county for which he shall be chosen, or who shall have resided in the said Territory of New Orleans three years, and be resident in the county for which he shall be chosen, and in either case shall likewise hold in his own right, in fee, two hundred acres of land within the same.

FEBRUARY, 1804.

Every person of the age of twenty-one years, having been a citizen of the United States, or having resided in the said Territory one year immediately preceding any election, shall be qualified to vote for a Representative or Representatives in the county in which he shall reside at the time of such election.

"The Governor and judges, or a majority of them, as soon as may be, after the said Territory shall have been divided into counties, and within — from the passing of this act, shall make the necessary regulations; and give time and place to the inhabitants of each county of the said Territory, qualified to vote as herein-before prescribed, to elect representatives to represent them in the General Assembly. The representatives thus elected shall serve for the term of one year, and in case of the death of a representative, or removal from office, the Governor shall issue a writ to the county for which he was a member, to elect another in his stead to serve for the residue of the term.

"The Legislative Council shall consist of — members, to continue in office one year, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States, a majority of whom shall be a quorum to do business; and they shall be appointed in the following manner, to wit: As soon as representatives shall be elected, the Governor shall appoint a time and place for them to meet, and when met, they shall nominate — persons, having the same qualifications as are herein declared necessary for representatives, and return their names to the Governor, who shall within — days thereafter, appoint and commission — of them to serve as a Legislative Council; and whenever a vacancy shall happen in the Council, by death or removal from office, the House of Representatives shall nominate two persons qualified as aforesaid for each vacancy, and return their names to the Governor, one of whom he shall appoint and commission for the residue of the term. The General Assembly shall meet at least once in every year, at the city of New Orleans, at such time after the first meeting as may be appointed by law. And the Governor shall have power on extraordinary occasions to convene the General Assembly.

"After the first election, representatives shall be elected annually, in such manner as the Legislature may direct, not contrary to the provisions of this act. And a Legislative Council shall likewise be annually appointed, in the manner herein-before directed.

"The General Assembly shall have authority to make laws in all cases for the good Government of the said Territory, not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States. All bills having passed by a majority in the House of Representatives, and by a majority of the Council, shall be referred to the Governor for his assent, but no bill or Legislative act whatever shall be of any force without his assent.

"The Legislature of the said Territory shall have no power over the primary disposal of the soil, nor to tax the lands of the United States, nor to interfere with the claims to land within the said Territory."

The Committee now rose and obtained leave to sit again; and the House ordered the section proposed as a substitute to be printed.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred, during the present session, a representation of Duncan McFarland, of the State of North Carolina, complaining of an undue election of SAMUEL D. PURVIANCE, returned to serve in this House as a member for the seventh election district in the said State; also, sundry depositions and other papers transmitted from the counties of Montgomery and Cumberland, being part of the aforesaid seventh district, in the case of the said contested election; made a report thereon; which was read, as follows:

"That at an election held at the times and places directed by a law of the State of North Carolina, for the election of a member to serve in the eighth Congress, for the seventh district of said State, among other complaints alleged by Duncan McFarland, it is proved by testimony, legally taken in presence of William McCarroll, the voluntary agent of Samuel D. Purviance, that, at the elections held at the different election districts into which the county of Montgomery is, by law, divided, the inspectors and clerks of the elections held at the several election divisions of the said county of Montgomery not only neglected, but refused, to take the oath obliging them to act with justice and impartiality, as directed by an act of Assembly of North Carolina, passed in the year 1802, notwithstanding that they were thereto required by Duncan McFarland, at the opening of the election; therefore, the committee, without deciding on the other complaints made against the said elections, consider the neglect and refusal to take the oath prescribed by law as sufficient ground to set aside the election held for the said county of Montgomery.

"That, with respect to the elections held at the election districts in and for the county of Cumberland, of the Congressional district aforesaid, a notification was given, according to law, by William Cochran, Esq., on the application of Duncan McFarland, on the 5th day of October, 1803, to Samuel D. Purviance, informing him of the times and places where depositions were to be taken, in support of the complaint of Duncan McFarland against the election of the said Samuel D. Purviance.

"That, agreeably to the notification, William McCarroll attended, and acted as the voluntary agent of Samuel D. Purviance; that from the examination taken on this notification, sufficient cause does not appear to change the state of the poll, so far as to set aside the elections held in and for the said county of Cumberland.

"That all the witnesses not appearing agreeably to the said notification, a second notification was left at the house of Samuel D. Purviance, for the said Samuel D. Purviance; or William McCarroll, directed to the said McCarroll, his friend, on the 2d of November, 1803, appointing another examination of witnesses on the 22d, 23d, 29th and 30th days of that month. Of this notification, Samuel D. Purviance, then in Congress, was not informed until the 23d, viz: the day after that on which the examination was to commence, and he had authorized no agent; and neither William McCarroll, nor any other person, attended as his voluntary agent.

"That, on the first day of December, a third notification was left at the house of Samuel D. Purviance, for the said Samuel D. Purviance, or William McCarroll, his agent, or friend, directed to the said William McCarroll, to attend on the ninth and tenth days following, to the further examination of witnesses, as aforesaid; but the notification did not, or could not, reach Samuel D. Purviance, then in Congress, in due time; and neither William McCarroll, nor any other person, in behalf of Samuel D. Purviance, attended.

"It further appears to the committee, that though various irregularities and abuses are set forth in the depositions taken, agreeably to the second and third notifications, and alleged to have been practised at the said election, yet that Samuel D. Purviance had not such notice as put it in his power to attend the said examination of witnesses, or to appoint an agent so to do.

MARCH, 1804.

"It further appears, from the documents, that depositions were taken, and examinations made, by magistrates who were not named in the notification issued by the magistrate to whom the application was made, and without a certificate of the matters and proceedings had by him in that behalf, as the law enacted by Congress provides. It also further appears that part of the testimony so taken is in the hand-writing of Duncan McFarland, one of the parties, and signed by the mark of the deponent, inconsistent with the act aforesaid, which provides that the magistrate shall cause the examination to be reduced to writing, in the presence of the parties, or their agents; which the committee are of opinion does not authorize the writing the examination by the parties themselves.

"Influenced by the aforementioned facts and circumstances, the committee are of opinion that the aforesaid testimony, respecting the election held in and for the county of Cumberland, cannot be admitted or acted on by the House.

"By comparing the certified records of the lists of taxables in said county, with the list of votes given at the election now contested, it appears that the number who voted exceeds the number of taxables in the county; viz: the number of persons who voted is 1,159, and the number of free taxable polls taken from the last returns of taxables is 1,117; but the committee discover that the tax lists of any year, agreeably to the laws of North Carolina, are not a perfect record of those who are entitled to vote, because citizens who, at any time, had formerly paid taxes, by the laws of that State, appear to the committee to continue to enjoy the privilege of voting, though they might, for many years, have ceased to pay taxes.

"Therefore your committee are of opinion that there is not sufficient legal testimony to set aside the election of Cumberland county, so as to vacate the seat of Samuel D. Purviance."

The report was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

THURSDAY, March 1.

An engrossed bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of Virginia, therein mentioned, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill making an appropriation for carrying into effect the Convention concluded between the United States and the King of Spain, on the eleventh day of August, one thousand eight hundred and two, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill altering the days of session of the District Court for the District of Virginia was read the third time and passed.

Mr. RODNEY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the appointment of an additional Judge for the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof," being called for, a motion was made, and the question being put that the said order of the day be postponed until to-morrow, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting a detailed report of the amount of postage in each State for three successive years, commencing with the first of October, 1800, and ending on the 30th of September, 1803, together with the expense of transporting the mails on all roads, in each State, and the amount of commissions of postmasters, as well as the other expenses in relation to the post offices, in three books, marked A, B, C, together with a summary report of the same, marked D, in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the fifth December last.—Referred to Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. A. TRIGG, and Mr. HAMPTON, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House to whom was referred, on the twenty-third and twenty-seventh of January last, a report, in part, of the committee to whom were referred the petitions of sundry residents and purchasers of land in the State of Ohio; also, a farther report, in part, of the same committee, on "the expediency of amending the several acts providing for the sale of the public lands of the United States," be discharged from the consideration of the same.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Elections, respecting the election of THOMAS LEWIS, the sitting member, declaring him not entitled, and declaring ANDREW MOORE entitled to a seat.

Mr. BALDWIN called for the reading of part of the evidence transmitted from the county of Greenbriar, which being read at the Clerk's table, Mr. B. observed, that as the Committee of Elections were not unanimous in their report, he felt it his duty, being one of those who were opposed to it, to state the ground of their opposition, in the hope that it might influence the House to reject the report. As no facts were detailed in the report as the basis of the result, he had called for the reading of the evidence from Greenbriar; the issue of the election depending on the principles to be adopted relative to the votes of that county. From the facts thus disclosed he was opposed to the report.

The act of Congress regulating the mode of taking evidence relating to contested elections, requires that a notification of the time, place, and object of the examination of witnesses shall be served on the opposite party, a convenient time before the day appointed, that he may be present.

It appeared that the election was in the month of April. The President's proclamation for an extraordinary meeting of Congress was published in July, yet no measures were taken by the petitioner for the examination of witnesses until the month of September. The sitting member was notified to attend an examination at the court-house in Greenbriar on the 21st of that month. He attended, and the witnesses attended, but the petitioner neglected to appear or proceed in the examination. After this, notification was issued, on the 29th of September, fixing the time for the examination of witnesses at the same place, on the 12th day of October, accompanied with a written direction from the magistrate who issued it, that it should be served by copy five days before the 12th. It appeared by the affidavit on the return, that service was made by posting a copy on the door of the dwelling-house of the sitting member on the 6th of October, after he had left home and was on his way to the seat of Government, in obedience to the proclamation of the President of the United States requiring his attendance in Congress on the 17th of the same month, a distance of three hundred miles from his place of residence; that no person was left residing in his house, and he had no actual notice of the service. That when on his journey, at Lexington, seventy miles from home and more than one hundred from Greenbriar court-house, on the 8th of October, within four days' time of examination, a copy was put into his hands, as also appears by the affidavit.

This notice he said he did not consider such as ought to bind the sitting member. A notice of five days at least was required by the terms of the warrant; the service on the 8th gave but four days; this of course could not be claimed on any principle as legal service. Of the copy left at his house, it did not appear that he had or could have actual notice, and this alone is the notice which can be pretended to give validity to the evidence.

It is true, that by law, the magistrate issuing the warrant shall fix the time for its service; but he shall also fix a convenient time having respect to the distance. It was a fact well known through the country, that Congress were to meet on the 17th, and that according to the principles assumed in the act fixing the compensation for the travel of members, allowing one day for twenty miles, he might claim fifteen days for his journey. This notice was served within eleven days of the commencement of the session, and after the sitting member had in fact commenced his journey. His appearance was to be within five days of the session. The time fixed could not therefore be convenient or reasonable, even if service had been actually made. Indeed it may well be questioned whether the privilege of the House does not protect its members from the service of a process, so directly calculated to divert their attention from the concerns of the nation, during the period of its privilege, without its consent. He was therefore of opinion that the notice was not such as could on any principle bind the sitting member. It appears from the documents that a friend of the sitting member attended as his voluntary agent, but it also appears that he protested against the notice, and that he neither had instructions nor authority to appear. Such appearance can give no validity to the evidence. He further observed that if the notice, such as it was, should be deemed legal, and the evidence taken under it admissible, he still contended the proof was insufficient to warrant the report.

By the laws of Virginia the right of voting for Representatives in Congress is in freeholders having certain specified quantities of estate, and when entitled by deed or grant with six months' possession. The mode of elections is prescribed by law, and known officers are designated to superintend the elections and certify the result. The result of this election is by the proper officers duly certified in favor of the sitting member. From the return of these officers, under the sanction of their official oath, the presumption is in favor of the due election of the member returned and of the legality of his votes, and cannot be set aside without stronger proof on the part of the petitioner. Let us then examine the proof on which he relies. The proof of the petitioner is in fact nothing more than the land list of the county. He rests his claim on a result of a comparison of the poll with this list, and the rejection of those from the poll whose names are not on the list.

By the poll for the county of Greenbriar, it appears that 589 votes were given for the sitting member, 245 of which do not appear on the land list; and 202 of these are eventually rejected by the committee as bad votes, and thus a majority of 59 is reported in favor of the petitioner. Of the 202 votes thus rejected, 175 were decided to be bad on no other proof than that they were not found on the land list.

As this alone turns the election, it becomes a serious question how far the land list is in any instance, and particularly in this country, a criterion to determine the qualifications of voters. It is not by any express law made a criterion; nor can it from its nature be such, even when most perfect. It appears that a list of lands was made for the purpose of taxation in the year 1782, and that the law of the State requires that the returns shall annually be made to the commissioners of the county, from the registers, of all new titles, and from the clerk of the county, of the records of conveyances. It cannot be presumed therefore that it can show the changes of title within the year, nor of course the right to vote which such titles may convey.

A freeholder by descent or marriage may vote immediately on the acquisition of title; a purchaser may vote after six months' possession, and is not required to record his deed for any purpose under eight months, and his right of voting would continue if the title should never be recorded; a freeholder by lease has also a right to vote; of course there is a numerous class of voters whose right will never appear by the land list. A document which must necessarily be so imperfect ought not in any case to be a criterion by which alone the right of suffrage shall be denied to those whose names do not appear on it. But it is in proof that the land list of the county of Greenbriar is peculiarly inaccurate and imperfect. It is a new county, and vast tracts of land have been located and patented within a few years, the titles of which do not appear on this list. The deposition of nine persons, including the sheriff, clerk, surveyor, the late and present commissioners, with others, selected as men best acquainted with the circumstances of this list, has been read. Those men on their oaths declare that this list is of their own knowledge unusually inaccurate; that it does not contain half the land in the county; that the returns have not been regularly made to the commissioner, and that no returns of patents have been made from the register's office since the year 1782. That the inaccuracy became so apparent as to induce the Legislature to attempt a revision in 1796. That so many difficulties occurred in the execution of this law that it was repealed in 1799, and the list has never been revised; and, in their opinion, is no criterion whereby to test the important right of suffrage.

It further appears by their deposition that so far as they jointly or severally know the persons objected to because not on the list, they are in possession of real estate, and in their opinion are legal voters. Such is the evidence respecting the land list of this county, coming from witnesses summoned on the part of the petitioner. Yet it is contended, and your committee, by their report, have sanctioned the principle, that this imperfect list, though unsupported even by the affidavit of belief, that those whose names do not appear on it are unqualified, shall turn the proof of the legality of nearly half the votes of the county upon the sitting member; and this too without ever furnishing him with a list of objectionable votes till the moment of examination. Thus not less than 175 voters out of 539 are deprived of the right of suffrage without opportunity of defence.

If this mode of taking proof, without previous notice of the points to which it is to apply, shall be sanctioned by the House; if the land list, however imperfect, is to be the criterion of the qualifications of voters; if the neglect of the petitioner to take his proof in the proper time is to be disregarded; if the privilege of the House and the rights of the member must yield to the humor of the petitioner, surely the House will not suffer the member to be entrapped while in discharge of his duties by notice merely constructive, where the actual presence of the party is so essentially necessary to rebut the presumptions arising from such negative proof.

As Mr. B. was clearly of opinion that the notice given would not sanction the evidence, and that this land was not a criterion whereby to test the right of suffrage, he hoped the House would not agree to the report.

Messrs. FINDLEY and VARNUM supported, and Messrs. JACKSON and HUGER opposed the report. Messrs. R. GRISWOLD, GREGG, DAWSON, EARLY, and J. RANDOLPH, delivered their sentiments with a view principally to obtain explanations of facts or principles involved in the report.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH then moved that the Committee should rise in order to give the petitioner an opportunity of being heard at the bar of the House.

The Committee rose, and the motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HUGER, permission was given to the petitioner and the sitting member to be heard by counsel.

The further consideration of the report was then postponed until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, March 2.

Ordered, That the report, in part, of the committee on the petitions of sundry residents and purchasers of land in the State of Ohio, made the twenty-third of January last; also, a further report, in part, of the same committee, "on the expediency of amending the several acts providing for the sale of the public lands of the United States," made the twenty-seventh of the same month, from the consideration of which the Committee of the whole House were yesterday discharged, be referred to Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. MORROW, Mr. DWIGHT, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. BRYAN, with leave to report thereon by way of bill or bills.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill granting further time for locating military land warrants, and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with an amendment thereto; which was read twice and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the bill, with the amendment, be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill relating to ferries in the District of Columbia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of fixing the standard of weights and measures.

Ordered, That Mr. RODNEY, Mr. J. CLAY, Mr. TENNEY, Mr. S. L. MITCHILL, and Mr. T. M. RANDOLPH, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to erect a light-house on the south end of St. Simon's island, in the State of Georgia, and for the placing a buoy or buoys on or near St. Simon's bar," together with a report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures thereon, made the twenty-seventh ultimo; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments to the bill; which were twice read and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be read the third time to-morrow.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of the whole House be discharged from further consideration of the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on laying a tonnage duty on foreign ships and vessels, to be denominated light-money; and the report of the same committee on various memorials and petitions for the encouragement of domestic arts, trades, and manufactures; and that the said two reports be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the supplementary report of the Committee of Claims, of the first ultimo, to whom was recommitted, on the twelfth of December last, their report on the petition of David Valenzin; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported two resolutions thereupon; which were severally twice read and agreed to by the House, as follow:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for restoring to the legal representatives of David Valenzin the value of the property captured from him in the Mediterranean by the American squadron, in the month of January, one thousand eight hundred and three.

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for indemnifying the individuals who, during the imprisonment of the said David Valenzin, contributed to his support, and who have defrayed the expenses of his interment.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate, in their capacity of a Court of Impeachments, are ready to proceed on the impeachment of John Pickering, in the Senate Chamber, and that the said Chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives. Communicating also an attested copy of the forms of proceeding agreed to by the Senate, to be observed on the trial of the said impeachment.

The said message was read: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the managers appointed on the second of January last, do now attend in the Senate Chamber for the purpose of conducting the impeachment against John Pickering, on the part of this House.

The resolution fixing the period for the adjournment of the two Houses was taken up.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved a postponement of the further consideration until this day week; which was disagreed to by yeas and nays—yeas 52, nays 62; when,

On motion of Mr. J. CLAY, a postponement was made to Monday—yeas 72.

The bill providing for the civil expense of the government of Louisiana, appropriating $20,000, having passed through Committee of the Whole, was ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. THOMAS observed, that some time ago, when a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution designating the persons voted for as President and Vice President was before that House, a motion had been made and repeated, to consider at the same time another resolution proposing an amendment districting the States for the choice of Electors of President and Vice President; at that time, although he was decidedly in favor of amending the Constitution so as to direct the States to be districted for the choice of Electors by the people, he opposed these motions, because he was against blending the two amendments in one proposition; he considered that each ought to stand on its own merits, but as the one designating the President and Vice President has been agreed to, and sent out to the States, and which he was happy to hear had been generally approved by the State Legislatures, he now wished to consider the other proposition; and in order to try the sense of the House whether they would take it up for this session or not, he moved that the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution districting the States for the choice of Electors of President and Vice President, be committed to a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was lost.

SATURDAY, March 3.

An engrossed bill granting further time for locating military land warrants, and for other purposes, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill providing for the expenses of the civil government of Louisiana, was read the third time and passed.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to erect a light-house on the south end of St. Simon's island, in the State of Georgia, and for the placing a buoy or buoys on or near St. Simon's bar," together with the amendments agreed to yesterday, was read the third time. And on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Resolved, That the title of the said bill be, "An act to provide for light-houses and buoys, in the cases therein mentioned, and to establish the district of St. Mary's for that of Nanjemoy."

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to prepare and report a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend, for a limited time, the collection of bonds due to the United States by merchants of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in Virginia, who have suffered by the late conflagration of part of the town of Norfolk.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the emoluments of the officers employed in the collection of the customs for the year one thousand eight hundred and three, together with a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury thereon; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. J. C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of David Valenzin, deceased, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House, as soon as may be, a particular statement of all the moneys which, since the establishment of the present Government, have been

MR. J. CLAY spoke against the report, on the ground that the sitting member had not received due notice to examine witnesses on a canvass of votes in one of the counties.

MR. J. RANDOLPH spoke at length in favor of that part of the report which declares the sitting member not entitled to his seat, without expressing an opinion on admitting Andrew Moore to the seat; when the House adjourned without taking any question on the report.

MONDAY, March 5.

MR. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed on the second instant, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the public lands south of the State of Tennessee;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

MR. NICHOLSON, from the committee, presented a bill making provision for the disposal of the public lands in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

MR. S. L. MITCHILL, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, on the ninth ultimo, the memorial and petition of sundry citizens of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, and mariners of the United States in the said city, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom was committed, on the third of January last, a motion respecting "the application of surplus moneys collected in the different ports of the United States for the relief and maintenance of sick and disabled seamen."

MR. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the town of Norfolk; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-day.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate, in their capacity of a Court of Impeachments, will, at 12 o'clock, to-morrow, open the said Court, in the Senate Chamber, and be ready to proceed on the trial of the impeachment of John Pickering.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections on the petition of Andrew Moore, respecting the seat held by Thomas Lewis.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD moved a postponement of the further consideration of the report till the first Monday in November, that in the meantime opportunity should be given to ascertain facts.

Mr. DAWSON opposed the postponement.

Mr. J. CLAY also opposed the postponement; and declared, for reasons assigned by him, that he should vote in favor of the first part of the report, declaring that Thomas Lewis does not appear to be entitled to a seat, and against the second part, declaring Andrew Moore entitled to a seat, that a new election might be held.

A debate ensued on the motion to postpone, which continued the whole day; when the question was taken, and the motion lost—ayes 36.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the first member of the report, viz: that Thomas Lewis, not being duly elected, is not entitled to a seat in this House and carried in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 39, as follows:

The question was then put, that the House do agree to the second and last member of the said last clause of the report, in the words following, to wit:

“And that Andrew Moore, who has the highest number of votes, after deducting the before-mentioned unqualified votes from the respective polls, is duly elected, and entitled to a seat in this House.”

And resolved in the affirmative—yeas 64, nays 41, as follows:

Whereupon, the said ANDREW MOORE took his seat in the House as the Representative for the district composed of the counties of Botetourt, Rockbridge, Kenawha, Greenbriar, and Monroe, in the State of Virginia; the oath to support the Constitution of the United States being first administered to him by Mr. SPEAKER, according to law.

TUESDAY, March 6.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill supplementary to the act entitled “An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia;” which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Question of Adjournment.

H. OF R.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House, to whom was referred, on the twenty-ninth ultimo, a report of the committee appointed "to inquire whether the moneys drawn from the Treasury of the United States, on account of the Marine Corps, from the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight to the end of the year one thousand eight hundred and three, have been fully applied to the public service, in conformity to the existing laws," be discharged from the consideration thereof; and that the said report be recommended to Mr. LEFF, Mr. BOYLE, Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, Mr. A. MOORE, and Mr. N. R. MOORE.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the committee appointed on the Message of the President respecting the state of the public buildings in Washington, made a report, stating the objects on which the sum appropriated at the last session was expended, expressing their opinion that two annual appropriations of fifty thousand dollars ought to be made, and will be sufficient to finish the south wing of the Capitol in a commodious manner, and recommending an immediate appropriation of fifty thousand dollars.—Referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VARNUM moved a resolution for the appointment of a committee to consider if any and what alterations are necessary in the Military Peace Establishment.—Agreed to.

[Mr. V. founded this resolution on the expediency of increasing the number of surgeons' mates, rendered necessary by the increased garrisons, arising out of the possession of Louisiana, and on an opinion entertained of the propriety of substituting malt in the room of spirituous liquors.]

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed on the seventh of January last, "to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of Richard Peters, district judge of the district of Pennsylvania; and to report their opinion whether the said Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, or either of them, have so acted, in their judicial capacity, as to require the interposition of the Constitutional power of this House," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

A petition of the members of the Richmond James River Company, signed in behalf of the said company by Robert Pollard, their chairman, was presented to the House and read, praying that the assent of Congress may be given to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, entitled "An act for improving the navigation of James river;" which was read, and referred to Mr. CLORTON, Mr. CUTTS, and Mr. CONRAD; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the town of Norfolk was read the third time and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred, during the present session, a representation of Duncan McFarland, of the State of North Carolina, complaining of an undue election of SAMUEL D. PURVIANCE, returned to serve in this House as a member for the seventh election district in the said State; as also sundry depositions and other papers transmitted from the counties of Montgomery and Cumberland, being part of the aforesaid seventh district, in the case of the said contested election; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Resolved. That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire into the propriety of repealing the ninth section of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen;" and that they have leave to report by bill.

QUESTION OF ADJOURNMENT.

The House proceeded to the further consideration of the report of the joint committee of the two Houses "on the business necessary to be done by Congress in their present session, and when it may be expedient to close the same," made on the twentieth ultimo. Whereupon, the resolution submitted by the said committee being read, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session, by adjourning their respective Houses on the second Monday in March next."

A motion was made, and the question being put, to amend the said resolution by striking out therefrom the words "second Monday in March next," it was resolved in the affirmative.

Another motion was then made and seconded, that the further consideration of the said resolution, as amended, be postponed until Monday next; and the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 44, nays 56, as follows:

er of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session, by adjourning their respective Houses on the third Monday in the present month:

It was resolved in the affirmative.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE PICKERING.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the managers appointed the second of January last, to conduct the impeachment, on the part of this House, against John Pickering, District Judge of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, made a report; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was read, and is as follows:

"The managers appointed on the part of this House to appear at the bar of the Senate, for the purpose of supporting the articles of impeachment against John Pickering, District Judge of the district of New Hampshire, for high crimes and misdemeanors, report:

"That, on Friday, the second of March, the managers, agreeably to the directions of the House, appeared at the bar of the Senate to support the said articles of impeachment, when John Pickering was three times solemnly called, but did not answer or appear, either in person or by counsel. The President of the Senate then stated, that he had received a letter signed R. G. HARPER, accompanying a petition signed Jacob S. Pickering, who called himself the son of the party charged. The petition being read, it was found to contain a statement of a variety of matter, particularly the insanity of Judge Pickering, upon which the prayer of the petition was founded for a postponement of the trial to some future day. Mr. HARPER was called to the bar of the Senate; he entered, and stated, that he wished it to be distinctly understood, that he did not appear at the bar of the Senate as counsel for John Pickering, from whom he had received no authority for that purpose; but that his only object was to support the facts contained in the petition of Jacob S. Pickering, and the prayer thereof. There was a short pause; when Mr. HARPER rose again, and inquired whether his appearance, in support of the petition, would be construed as the appearance of John Pickering, by counsel? The President of the Senate answered, he presumed, that Mr. HARPER's appearance would not be considered as the appearance of John Pickering, by counsel.

"The managers, under these circumstances, felt themselves bound to object to Mr. HARPER's being heard in any other capacity than as counsel for the party who was impeached; and briefly stated their reasons for the objection. The Senate withdrew to a private chamber, where it is presumed the question was debated. The managers again appeared at the bar of the Senate, this day, and were informed by the President, that it had been resolved to hear Mr. HARPER in support of the allegations contained in the petition of Jacob S. Pickering, and the prayer thereof. The managers inquired at what point of time it was intended that Mr. HARPER should be heard, and whether this was to be a measure preliminary to the trial? The President of the Senate declared that he could not undertake to explain the resolutions of the Senate; but that their sense must be collected from the resolutions themselves. The managers then offered themselves ready for trial, declaring that they were prepared to open the prosecution on behalf of the House of Representatives; and that the witnesses were ready to prove the facts charged in the articles of impeachment. Upon this offer being made, the President of the Senate stated, that he considered it to be the sense of the Senate that Mr. HARPER was to be heard before the trial commenced.

"The managers considering this as an irregular step, and not believing that they ought to discuss any petition presented to the Senate from a person who was not a party to the impeachment, and this, too, before the party charged, although duly notified, had appeared, either in person or by attorney, withdrew from the Senate Chamber. They will not feel themselves either bound or authorized to appear again, until the Senate shall inform them that they are prepared to proceed in the trial, unless specially directed by this House."

Mr. SMILIE moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House doth approve of the conduct of the managers appointed to support the articles of impeachment in the case of John Pickering, as stated in their report of this day, and that the said managers do not appear at the bar of the Senate until they shall be specially instructed by this House.

Mr. ELLIOT moved to strike out the words "as stated in their report of this day."

Mr. ELMER remarked that the managers appeared to consider the proceedings of the Senate incorrect. This might be the case; but, from the information before him, he was not prepared to say so. He was of opinion that the Senate were the sole judges of the mode of conducting the trials before them.

Mr. SMILIE.—The Senate undoubtedly have the right of fixing their mode of procedure; but if that mode shall be such as to interfere with our rights, we have a right to insist upon them. Such a procedure, as has been adopted by the Senate, in the present instance, I have never heard of. But if the managers are satisfied with what has been already done, without any further act on the part of the House, I am also. It is my wish that they would inform us what they desire.

Mr. DANA.—It is very proper for the managers of an impeachment to apply to the House on the occurrence of a new case; but it is not necessary for the House to express an opinion of their conduct in every stage of the trial. It may be proper to give them instructions when they desire it; but it is not necessary to pass a vote of approbation or disapprobation on their conduct. In this case it is entirely useless, and may be injurious. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—The managers entertain no other desire but that of being guided, in the discharge of the duty devolved upon them, by the directions of the House. They would deem it a matter of extreme regret, were the House to disapprove their conduct on the present occasion. But no individual among them—I speak for myself, and believe I may likewise speak for all those associated with me—wishes a vote of approbation by this House. I would, therefore, be pleased if the gentleman would agree to strike out that part of the resolution which expresses such approbation. If the mover does not agree to this modification, I shall take the liberty of moving it.

Mr. SMILIE.—I cannot agree to strike out this part of the resolution, as it is, in my opinion, the most important part of it. The conduct of the Senate has met with the disapprobation of the managers, and they have withdrawn from the court. Their conduct must be right or wrong. It is proper for the House to express an opinion, whether it is correct or incorrect.

Mr. NICHOLSON observed that on further reflection he did not consider himself at liberty to make any motion, or to vote on any made, on the subject before the House.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL was of opinion that it would only be necessary for the House to express an opinion, in case they disapproved the conduct of the managers.

Mr. HUGER declared himself of the same opinion.

Mr. J. LEWIS moved a postponement of the further consideration of the motion until to-morrow.

Mr. SMILIE had no objection to the postponement.

All further procedure was arrested by the agreement to a motion of Mr. NICHOLSON to adjourn—yeas 60.

WEDNESDAY, March 7.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplemental to the act, entitled "An act concerning the City of Washington; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year one thousand eight hundred and four, with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. And that the Senate, in their capacity of a Court of Impeachments, are now ready to receive and hear the managers appointed on the part of this House, in support of the articles of impeachment against John Pickering, District Judge of the district of New Hampshire.

GEORGIA CLAIMS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the settlement of sundry claims to public lands lying south of the State of Tennessee; to which Committee of the Whole were also referred, on the twentieth ultimo, a motion containing sundry resolutions "respecting claimants to the said lands under an act of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, passed in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five."

Mr. J. RANDOLPH called for the reading of sundry resolutions lately offered by him on this subject. The resolutions having been read, Mr. R. said, when he had submitted them, it was with the view of trying the question then before the Committee as he thought fairly. It was no part of his intention to embarrass the operations of the friends of the bill, further than to take the sense of the Committee and of the House on each specific proposition embraced by the resolutions. His wish, therefore, was, that the sense of the Committee, in the first instance, should be taken on the resolutions. If they should be rejected, the vote of rejection would be a virtual admission of the claims of 1795; and gentlemen might then modify the bill in such manner as might best please them to do.

The CHAIRMAN said he was of opinion, that the bill being first committed had the preference.

The first section of the bill was then read, and no objections made to it, as follows:

"Be it enacted, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General for the time being, shall be, and they are hereby appointed Commissioners on the part of the United States, to receive propositions of compromise and settlement from the several companies, and persons having claims to public lands lying west of the State of Georgia, and south of the State of Tennessee, derived under any act or pretended act of the State of Georgia; and the said Commissioners are authorized to compound and settle the same, in such manner as they shall deem most advantageous to the interests of the United States: Provided, however, That in such settlement due regard shall be had to the articles of agreement and cession entered into on the twenty-fourth day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, between the United States and the State of Georgia; and to the provisions of an act of Congress passed on the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee."

The second section was read, as follows;

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the time limited in the last above recited act for exhibiting and recording evidences of claims in the Secretary of State's office, shall be, and the same is hereby, extended to the first day of March next: Provided, That nothing in this act contained, shall ever be hereafter construed to recognise or affect the said claims or any of them.

Mr. NICHOLSON said the bill provided for a settlement of claims to public lands south of the State of Tennessee, and the power was given to certain officers to make the settlement. Since the bill had been reported, he was induced to think that the settlement ought not to be binding without giving Congress an opportunity of considering it. He would therefore offer a section to this effect. Mr. N. accordingly offered a motion directing that the report of the Commissioners should be binding, unless this act be repealed within six months after the settlement shall be made; he observed that a similar provision had been made in the articles of cession between the United States and Georgia.

Mr. LUCAS opposed the amendment on the ground that it did not extend far enough; and contended for the propriety of vesting in Congress unlimited power over the subject; and moved to amend the motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, by adding "if approved by Congress shall be binding on the United States."

Mr. NICHOLSON said he would only observe that if this amendment should be agreed to, it would leave the business in the same situation in which it now stood, Commissioners having been already authorized to make a settlement, to be binding when ratified by the United States.

MARCH, 1804.

Georgia Claims.

H. OF R.

Mr. LUCAS's amendment was then rejected—yeas 45, nays 50.

The motion of Mr. NICHOLSON recurring,

Mr. BEDINGER said, the foundation was so bad that the superstructure could not be amended. It was degrading to the United States to compel Congress within six months to approve or disapprove the act of any three individuals. Suppose the settlement were made at the close of a session, it would be necessary in that case to convene Congress.

The question was then taken on Mr. NICHOLSON's amendment, and decided in the negative—yeas 38, nays 51.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said, he would move an amendment, which would try the merits of the question, to wit: to strike out the words "or pretended act," and insert an additional proviso, at the end of the section, as follows: "And provided that no proposition of compromise or settlement be received by the said Commissioners, from any persons claiming under any act or pretended act of the State of Georgia, alleged to be passed during the year 1795."

A division being called for, the question was first taken on striking out the words "pretended act," and passed in the negative—yeas 44, nays 55.

The question was then taken on inserting the additional proviso at the end of the section, which likewise passed in the negative—yeas 46, nays 57.

Mr. VARNUM moved, that the Committee should rise, report their agreement to the bill without amendment, and that they had made some progress in considering the resolutions referred to them.

Mr. RODNEY hoped the the Committee would first consider the resolutions, and take a question on them. To rise in this stage of the business would be to give them the go-by.

Mr. ELMER.—The Committee have already sufficiently considered them; the amendment just moved embraces their substance. That amendment has been negatived; the other resolutions are confined to abstract points.

Mr. RODNEY.—I hope the Committee will not rise, but that they will consider the resolutions. It is said the principle of the resolutions is contained in the amendment offered by my friend from Virginia. I take those resolutions to contain premises from which certain inferences must flow. They contain what I believe to be the vital principles of government, and require no proof to elucidate them; like axioms in mathematics, they only require to be stated to be self-evident. It is not, therefore, my desire to go into their discussion, but it is my desire to learn whether we are agreed among ourselves. I wish to know whether the Government of Georgia were at any time "invested with the power of alienating the right of soil possessed by the good people of that State, in and to the vacant territory of the same, but in a rightful manner and for the public good." I wish to know why, "when the governors of any people shall have betrayed the confidence reposed in them, and shall have exercised that authority with which they have been clothed for the general welfare, to promote their own private ends, under the basest motives and to the public detriment," it is not the "inalienable right of a people so circumstanced to revoke the authority thus abused, to resume the rights thus attempted to be bartered, and to abrogate the act thus endeavoring to betray them." I wish to proceed in the same manner, and see if the premises are not good and the inferences sound. If this shall appear to be the case, it will not be too late to adopt the amendment proposed by my friend, and express a decided opinion on the celebrated act of 1795. So much has been, however said on this subject, that I will not at present further trespass on the patience of the Committee.

Mr. MITCHILL.—These resolutions tend to involve Congress in the proceedings of the State of Georgia. I consider myself as one of those who, by assenting to certain acts heretofore passed by Congress, have consented to a hearing and compromise with the grantees. If this construction be correct, the Committee are precluded from adopting these resolutions; nor is it proper, in my opinion, for Congress to go into a view of the proceedings of Georgia on this occasion. That State is sovereign to a certain extent, and this Government possesses no right to interfere with her sovereignty. Attached to this sovereignty is the right of granting land belonging to her. But it is alleged that Georgia was, in the year 1795, in a disorderly state, and that a certain Legislature in that year did a certain act which a subsequent Legislature declared to be totally unauthorized. This may be so. It is certain the second Legislature declared the act of the first null, under circumstances of a very extraordinary nature. I do not, however, see that it is our duty to give an opinion whether the Legislature of Georgia acted wickedly or uprightly. Which ever course they may have pursued, I do not believe this body to be a Constitutional board of censors. We find frequent occasions enough on which, without going out of our way, our duty calls upon us to give our opinions. Believing this to be an occasion on which no opinion is required from us, and one which it is most prudent to pass by without giving such opinion, I wish not to vote for or against the resolutions. I am, therefore, for the Committee's rising and reporting the bill. If this motion does not succeed, I shall be prepared to move a postponement of the whole subject until the first Monday in December. By so doing, I am ready to avow that my object is to get rid of the discussion of the resolutions, and to avoid voting on them in detail.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—I had hoped that when these resolutions were sent from the House to the Committee, they would have received the respectful attention to which every such reference is entitled; and that the Committee would at least have deemed them worthy of some expression of opinion on them; that they would have deigned to say whether the reasoning or facts contained in them are or are not erroneous and unfounded. The gentleman from New York tells the Committee that, by an act passed at a previous session of Congress, a pledge has been given to a certain description of claimants under the act of 1795, to do something in relation to their claims. If so, is this a reason for not acting on the resolutions? No; it is a reason for taking them up and rejecting them. One of those resolutions says, and I am prepared to prove it true, and I call on gentlemen to show its falsehood, "that the claims of persons derived under the act of January first, 1795, are recognised neither by any compact between the United States and the State of Georgia, nor by any act of the Federal Government." I deny that they are so recognised. If they are, what can be easier than for the learned gentleman to refer to the compact under which they are recognised? This he cannot show, and hence his unwillingness to express an opinion. At an antecedent session we passed a law on this subject. The gentleman may have given his vote for this law under the impression he states, but it does not follow that the Legislature acted under the same impression; on the contrary, I know several gentlemen who voted for it, though hostile to the claims under the act of 1795, because it contained a general provision for claims, and did not particularly recognise those arising under the act of 1795; and now, because Congress have passed an act of a general nature, when it was notorious there are a variety of claims besides those under the act of 1795, and none of which are mentioned either in the compact or treaty with the State of Georgia, it is said we have given a pledge, and we are called upon to fulfil it. And this language is held by gentlemen who, in the same breath, have expressed a disposition to reject another description of claims. Could absurdity speak in stronger language? A general appropriation has been made by Congress for claims; the claims preferred are of two classes—those under the acts of 1789 and 1795. There might have been claims of an hundred other descriptions—for all these Congress have made a general appropriation—and yet we are told by gentlemen hostile to the claims of 1789 that we are pledged to provide for those of 1795. If we are pledged to satisfy one description, are we not equally pledged to the other? But the truth is, we have given no pledge. If we have, nothing is so easy as to refer to the statute book, and to point it out. No such pledge is recognised by our compact with Georgia. While I am up, permit me to say, if the compact with Georgia be construed according to its letter, the appropriation of $5,000,000 ought to be considered as not embracing claims under the act of 1795, for the best reason in the world: the statute book of Georgia shows the reason. But, say gentlemen, we possess the power to satisfy these claims, though such satisfaction may not have been contemplated by our compact with Georgia. There must, say they, have been an understanding between the Commissioners of Georgia and our Commissioners in favor of compromising them, and therefore it is inferred that we ought to be governed more by the quo animo with which the compact was formed than by its strict letter; it is accordingly attempted to be proved, that there was an understanding between our Commissioners and those of Georgia, that relief should be extended to claimants under the act of 1795. I am authorized by the Commissioners to say that this was not the case. Whether, therefore, we are governed by the strict letter of the contract, or by the quo animo, we cannot discover the grounds for this opinion. I have been told, in a way which removes all doubts, by the Commissioners on both sides, at least by a Commissioner of the United States having a great participation in the business, and by the Georgia Commissioners, that the stipulation in the compact was not inserted at the instance of Georgia, but reluctantly inserted by them at the instance of the Commissioners of the United States.

When I rose, it was no part of my intention to make this reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, who considers us as precluded by a former vote from putting aside all claims under the act of 1795. If this is the case, why not take up the resolutions and negative them? When under consideration, he can assign his reasons against them, and if he is of opinion they go to violate the rights of an independent State, that is a reason which no gentleman need be ashamed to avow. I trust, therefore, if the resolutions are false, either in principle or in fact, the Committee will say so. If they are passed over in silence by the Committee, I shall certainly move them again in the House. I ask gentlemen, therefore, to say how their difficulty will be got over? unless we are told that, being in possession of the Committee, the House will be precluded from acting upon them. If this is the course intended to be pursued, I hope gentlemen will avow it. No course that can be pursued shall prevent me from bringing out the sense of the House. Whether the question on these resolutions shall be attempted to be got rid of by the previous question, or by a postponement, I will have the sense of the House expressed to the public; for this is one of the cases which, once being engaged in, I can never desert or relinquish, till I shall have exercised every energy of mind, and faculty of body I possess, in refuting so nefarious a project.

Mr. ELLIOT said he hoped that the Committee would not be intimidated by the threats of individual members, or induced by any means whatever to swerve from the correct course of proceedings. He hoped they would act with independence and with dignity. In respect to the manner of performing the business of legislation, no member can claim the right of exercising dictatorial powers. Yet we are told that we shall, at all events, pursue a particular course of conduct, and shall be compelled to give a separate vote upon every member of a connected series of abstract propositions, although we may be of opinion that the whole are improper to be acted on at all. Are we to be governed by violence? Are we to resort, on this occasion, to revolutionary principles? Shall the ipse dixit of the honorable mover prevent our precluding, in such manner as we may deem proper, a discussion which we may consider as impolitic and useless? It will not be denied that the result and the only possible result of the whole chain of resolutions before us, has been negatived by a majority of the Committee, in the form of an amendment to the bill upon your table. I believe it to be a maxim as well established as any of those which have this day been asserted as incontrovertible, that a majority should govern in a republican Government. Mr. E. hoped the Committee would carry this correct theory into practice on the present occasion.

MARCH, 1804.

The observations of the gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHILL) appear to me, said Mr. E. peculiarly impressive. But I have other objections to the resolutions, still stronger than those urged by that gentleman. I believe them repugnant to the spirit if not to the express letter of the Constitution of the United States. By that great national compact, all those rights and powers appertaining to the States, and not expressly yielded to the General Government, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. The Legislative powers of the State of Georgia, alluded to in these resolutions, belong to the class which has never been given up to the Union. We have no power, therefore, to make any decision upon their validity or invalidity, or to delineate the sphere or extent of their operation. It would be an act of usurpation. Whatever idea may be entertained of inquisitorial and censorial powers, in relation to other subjects, there can be no doubt that this would be an assumption, on the part of Congress, of inquisitorial and censorial powers over the State governments.

I hope the Committee will rise, and that an unnecessary and dangerous discussion will be closed as soon as possible. I regretted that the mover of the resolution announced his determination to compel us to record our votes upon a variety of propositions, however inconsistent with our own ideas of propriety and policy. I regretted that we were under the necessity of demolishing this blooming and wide-spreading tree of resolutions, by single branches. I am gratified that the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. VARNUM) has laid the axe to its root, and that we are enabled to prostrate it in the dust in a moment, "with all its blushing honors thick upon it."

Mr. EVSTIS said, in seconding the motion of his colleague, it was his desire that the bill should be reported, and the resolutions virtually dismissed from further consideration. Should the Committee, therefore, agree to rise, he should vote against their having leave to sit again on the resolutions. At this time, he should express no opinion respecting them. Whether they contained sound political axioms, or not, and such as the House ought to adopt, he would not say. He took it for granted they were offered to produce an effect on the conduct of the House in their Legislative capacity. Such was their avowed object. They all tended to one point, to the result embraced by the last resolution. When the mover of them offered the amendment just considered and rejected, he considered it as containing their substance; and he did expect that as a decision had been thus made on the conclusion, all necessity for a decision on the premises would be superseded. He did consider the determination of the Committee not to ingraft the amendment on the bill as foreclosing a discussion of the resolutions. He would submit it to the judgment of the gentleman from Virginia, whether a decision of the Committee on the resolution which contained the essence of the whole, was not conclusive. After such a decision he was almost led to inquire, whether it was in order to consider the rest? The Committee were not unconvinced that the gentleman from Virginia was deeply interested in the issue of this discussion. He had expressed himself with warmth. He wished to have the discussion again opened. But it does not follow that because any member makes a particular motion, that there is an obligation on the Legislature to consider it. The Legislature may have doubts of the propriety of considering it. The sameright is common to all. And if one gentleman, after the rejection of a motion, is indulged with the privilege of renewing it, other gentlemen being entitled to the same privilege, it will be impossible to progress with the public business. It is no imputation on any gentleman that a majority differs from him. The indisposition of a majority to consider a proposition is not a denial of its truth.

Mr. BEDINGER said he never expected to see the time when it would be out of the power of a respectable minority to express their opinion. On this subject he thought with his friend from Virginia. With him he would say to the opponents of the resolutions, examine them and see if they are not true. But some gentlemen seemed rather disposed to lay a bushel on the candle, to prevent their constituents from seeing what was going on. It was unnecessary to say more. If gentlemen were bent on pursuing their course, they must do it.

Mr. LYON said he wished to let his constituents know all he did. But from delicacy to the gentleman who had moved the resolutions, he wished to give them the go-by. As to the first resolution he would amend it by adding "of which such Legislature were judges." If that amendment should be rejected he would vote against the whole.

Messrs. LUCAS and SLOAN said a few words against the rising of the Committee.

Mr. MACON (Speaker) remarked that this question, like many others which presented themselves, had taken up a long time in discussing the preliminary point that might have been required on the resolutions. To rise and report the bill, without acting on the resolutions, would be a virtual rejection of them; especially as the House had determined to rise on the 19th. For one, Mr. M. said, he was ready to vote on the resolutions. If it were wrong to vote on them, it was certainly proper to vote against their reference. But why not vote on them? We may not all agree; but have we not a right to think for ourselves? Let us then meet them, and vote as we see best. Mr.

M. said he was more desirous of meeting the question, as he differed from those with whom he generally coincided in opinion. It may be said the resolutions embrace an abstract question. If so, gentlemen ought not to have allowed their reference. In the present stage of the business, no question could be taken unless in the Committee, or on a motion to discharge the Committee from their further consideration. Mr. M. said, he thought it the right of every member of a deliberative body to express his sentiments and record his opinion on any subject before it. This had always been the practice. He trusted, therefore, the Committee would not rise, but proceed to the discussion of the resolutions.

Mr. GRÆGG said, if it were earlier in the session, he might have no objection to a consideration of the resolutions, or if he thought, late as it was, that a discussion of them would take up but a short time. But he entertained no hope, from the variety of matter they contained, of the debate arising out of them being brought to a close within several days. The last resolution had been a short time since decided, in the shape of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia. This certainly expresses the sense of the Committee on the last resolution. The first resolution likewise had been virtually decided on by a former vote of the House. The substance of it had been much depended on by those opposed to the bill, and it had been this which had regulated their former vote. Mr. GRÆGG said he believed the principle it contained was generally correct. Those, however, in the majority appeared to entertain a different opinion, and were thence opposed to the principle of the resolutions. Mr. G. said he had no objection to having his vote recorded to the resolution. But he did not perceive the necessity, at this time, when the session was pressing to a close, of occupying unnecessarily the time of the House. He should, therefore, be in favor of a postponement.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—Certain resolutions have been submitted by the House to this Committee, and when it is proposed to take them up, objection is made, on the ground that no opinion ought to be expressed upon them, and a motion accordingly brought forward for the Committee to rise. From the prospect before us, it is probable that the Committee will rise, and if leave be given them to sit again, which seems to be the object of some gentlemen, these resolutions will be equally out of the power of the mover, or their friends. How far gentlemen were warranted in saying that this Committee, which although it being inferior only to the House itself, is yet subordinate to it, and as much bound by its instructions as any other committee whatever, should refuse to be governed by those instructions, he would not undertake to say: but of this he would assure them that how much soever they might embarrass, they should not defeat the discussion of this subject, by any course which they might pursue. Consistent only in their hostility to the resolutions, gentlemen advocated the Committee's rising by the most opposite and contradictory arguments; on the one hand contending that no opinion ought to be expressed upon them, whilst on the other, they assert that such opinion has been fully expressed. Irreconcilable in their objections, they are not less united in their object. When men for whatever reason, however opposite their premises, invariably agree in the same conclusion, by what arguments are they to be assailed? In this dilemma he was impelled much more by a sense of duty, than by any hope of success, to reply to some of the remarks which had fallen from various quarters of the Committee.

It was said, that the amendment which he had the honor to propose to the bill, which had been just then considered, embraced the substance of the resolutions, and that its rejection was a fair decision upon their merits. Permit me, (said Mr. R.) in the most explicit terms, to deny this position. One of these resolutions, and one only, to give gentlemen all that they can fairly ask, may have been virtually decided by the rejection of that amendment. But why will any one be hardy enough to assert that the question, "whether the act of Georgia, of 1795, was, or was not passed by the grossest corruption," was embraced in that amendment, or in any wise affected by the decision upon it? Surely not. Gentlemen who voted against that amendment have not, in debate, pretended to deny the fact. They cannot, they dare not deny it. He might go on and specify resolution after resolution, and show that no opinion had been expressed upon them. (one only excepted,) but the Committee would anticipate, in the recollection of their contents, all that could be urged to demonstrate the variance between them and the amendment. They must be satisfied of the feebleness and insufficiency of this objection. Before he touched on any other, he deemed it proper to answer some observations which had fallen from a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EUSTIS,) to the left. I must here, said Mr. R., express my satisfaction at finding myself supported by the conclusive authority of my respectable friend the Speaker, in the position which I assumed at the outset, that every member has a right to claim a decision on any question brought by him before the House, which they shall have agreed to consider. The gentleman from Massachusetts thinks differently. In his opinion no member has a right to interpret a refusal on the part of the House to act on his motion, into a personal disrespect to himself. I certainly have never expressed myself to the effect that this gentleman insinuates. If the zeal with which I have supported a claim, sanctioned by the highest authority here, has been so construed, it has been my misfortune, not for the first time perhaps, to give rise to erroneous impressions. From the warmth, however, which has been exhibited by the mover of these resolutions, whenever their subject has been agitated, the gentleman from Massachusetts would infer that they are the offspring of feeling, rather than of judgment. I could wish, sir, when that gentleman condescends to notice any remarks of mine, he would confine himself to their substance and matter, and not pass over these, in order to fix upon the manner in which they are delivered. If the warmth with which an opinion is supported be made the standard of its truth or falsehood, it will have been my misfortune, perhaps, never to have advanced a correct position on this floor. Some men have a smooth, oily, insinuating address; they can make you a proposition ruinous to yourself or to your country, with a face couched in smiles. Others can scarce offer you an interchange of civility without wounding your feelings; it is their misfortune. But I trust that the adventitious circumstances of temperament and complexion are not to be made the criterion of truth; that propositions and arguments will be decided here, upon their own intrinsic merits, and not by considerations altogether foreign from them. On other occasions we have heard much of party spirit and the rights of minorities. But this is one of those cases in which the tocsin of party spirit and an overruling majority will not answer the purpose in view. This is a season in which the old dark maxim "divide et impera" is to be resorted to; in which personal pique and private jealousies shall enable an hopeless opposition to hold the scales of this House—once hopeless, though now like Antæus rising from their fall. From observations made out of doors, I expected to hear these resolutions treated as an encroachment on the rights of Georgia, and by the very men, too, who did not scruple to usurp the jurisdiction of a great portion of the country in question, (the Mississippi Territory,) in contempt of the rights and in defiance of the remonstrances of that State. Yes, I was prepared to see some crocodile tears shed over the violated rights of the States. If experience did not prove that war, oppression, and misery, are embraced by the greater portion of mankind, in preference to peace, happiness, and freedom, it would be no difficult matter to demonstrate that these resolutions, so far from infringing upon the rights of Georgia, are in direct support of those rights, as asserted by her in the most solemn manner, at this day.

I little expected to stand on this floor, in the list of persons hostile to State rights—to be charged, as the gentleman before me has expressed himself, with having brought forward propositions subversive of the rights of the States. The sovereignty of the States has ever been the cardinal principle of my political opinions, and in the outset, I enlisted under the banner of State rights in opposition to federal usurpation. The doctrine of exalting the General Government on the ruin of the authority of the States, is at length exploded, and those who have heretofore been most conspicuous in encroaching upon the rights of the States, generally, and upon those of Georgia in particular, are now foremost in displaying their zeal for both. I cannot but rejoice at the acquisition which this cause has made. But to those of its friends, who are too new to it to understand its interests as yet, I would recommend, that they would take the conduct of the Georgia delegation as an evidence of the rights and interests of that State. They surely are not so destitute of information or fidelity, as to misunderstand or abandon the rights of the people whom they represent.—

So long, however, as I have the honor of concurring with them in opinion, I shall be very easy under any clamor which the new friends of Georgia and of the rights of States may endeavor to excite. If, however, gentlemen are unwilling to rely on the opinions of so few, however respectable men, I refer them to the act of the Legislature of Georgia herself, generally called the rescinding act, passed under circumstances of unparalleled unanimity and confirmed by the general voice of the people, who subsequently recognised it in, and ingrafted it upon their constitution. If still they remain dissatisfied, I would ask them if the recognition of the claims against Georgia, in the bill which they are so eager to pass, be not equally a violation of the rights of that State, with the rejection of those claims. Does not the bill before you, in pronouncing upon the validity of the act of Georgia, equally involve the principle against which gentlemen protest so loudly, with the resolutions themselves? They have their choice either to pronounce the corrupt act of 1795, or the rescinding act of 1796, invalid. Are not the rights of Georgia as much affected by the one as by the other? and even more, by annulling the act of 1796, since she alone recognises that to be her own. But gentlemen not only annihilate this act, without a scruple, but they support a bill predicated upon a principle which involves the validity of the other also, and then charge us with bringing forward propositions which, because they pronounce upon the acts of Georgia the same sentence which she herself has passed upon them, they denounce as subversive of the rights of Georgia, and with them, of every State in the Union. Will not these gentlemen give themselves the trouble to examine their right to legislate on this subject, at all? Will they refuse to see that we hold it by solemn grant from Georgia herself, without which we could not constitutionally pass any law in relation to the territory in question? It is this only which authorizes us, in any shape, to interfere in a matter which, otherwise, would exclusively belong to her. The act of interfering, and not the manner of that interference, with subjects cognizable by the State alone, would constitute an infraction of her rights. The bill which is advocated by gentlemen themselves would equally infringe the rights of Georgia with the provision which has been attempted to be inserted in it, but for our compact with her. Will any one pretend to say that these resolutions have for their object anything forbidden, either expressly or by implication, in that compact? That it stipulates for any provision for the claims under the act of 1795? Would the Georgia delegation unite in defeating those stipulations if any such indeed existed? Is not the right to reject involved in the right to grant those claims? Georgia having transferred the soil and jurisdiction of the country to the United States, subject to the existing claims against it, we have acquired precisely the same right over it that she herself had. We stand in her shoes. There cannot be a clearer position on earth, than that the moment she transferred to us those lands, subject to prior grants, (those grants not being specifically enumerated,) we became the judges of their validity. So sensible were we of this that we have appointed Commissioners to audit and adjust those claims—and I repeat, that the bill which is so strenuously supported by the opponents to these resolutions does pass upon the validity of the acts of 1795 and 1796, modifying and abridging the grants under the first, and altogether abrogating the last, to say nothing of the act of 1789, under which the Virginia and South Carolina companies claim. But, sir, these unfortunate resolutions, it seems, contain that damnable heresy in politics—abstract propositions. What are many clauses of your Constitution—of your bills and declarations of rights—but so many series of abstract principles? Let us examine whether the propositions, of whatever description, contained in these resolutions, are indeed foreign to the subject before the Committee—whether, on the contrary, they are not intimately and indissolubly connected with the provisions of the bill on your table. If, indeed, they were so vaguely expressed, or so loose in their application, they might have been safely left to expire in their own imbecility. But gentlemen have seen in them the evil genius of this bill, and hence their opposition.

Here Mr. R. read the first and second resolutions:

“Resolved, That the State of Georgia was at no time invested with the power of alienating the right of soil possessed by the good people of that State in and to the vacant territory of the same, but in a rightful manner and for the general good.”

Who will deny it? If Georgia has made a valid contract we must execute it. If invalid, there is no obligation on us to perform it.

“That when the governors of any people shall have betrayed the confidence reposed in them, and shall have exercised that authority with which they have been invested for the general welfare, to promote their own private ends, under the basest motives, and to the public detriment, it is the inalienable right of a people, thus circumstanced, to revoke the authority thus abused, to resume the rights thus attempted to be bartered, and to abrogate the act this endeavoring to betray them.”

I am afraid if we deny this position we have no title to show for our own existence as a nation.

Mr. R. here read the third resolution:

“That it is in evidence to this House that the act of the Legislature of Georgia passed on the 7th of January, 1795, entitled an act &c., was passed by persons under the influence of gross and palpable corruption, practised by the grantees of the lands attempted to be alienated by the aforesaid act, tending to enrich and aggrandize, to a degree almost incalculable, a few individuals, and ruinous to the public interest.”

If there be any objection in my mind to this resolution, it is that it does not sufficiently detail what it contains in substance; that the vendors of this iniquitous bargain being at the same time the vendees, the contract was therefore void. On a former occasion, when this position was advanced, we were told that, on the same principle, the sale of our western lands might be set aside, since members of the Legislature speculated in them to a vast amount. However indecorous and reprehensible this may have been in persons in their situation, there was a wide and material difference between the sales made by the United States and a pretended sale like this—not of a few acres, but of millions; not of sections and half sections, but of thousands of square miles; not measured by chains and perches, but by circles of latitude and longitude; not made in the face of day, on public notice, for a reasonable equivalent, and with the general participation of the citizens, but bartered away in the dark by wholesale for the emolument of the partners in the job, for a pretended consideration too paltry to give an air of validity to the contract; and even this sum, pitiful as it was, had since been drawn from the treasury of Georgia by those who had paid it, or others claiming under them by an act yet more infamous and disgraceful if possible than that by which it was deposited there. But it is not my intention at this time to enter into the particulars of this transaction. In the former stages of this bill I have endeavored to give a faithful history of it. Weak and vain, however, must be every effort to do justice to this enormous and atrocious procedure. Some gentlemen indeed will tell you that we have no proof of these facts. The depositions are ex parte, say they, and therefore in strictness of law cannot be considered as evidence. But when was it known that men could not legislate on less than legal evidence? Have we not the same evidence of the fraud that we have of the existence of the claims? Are not the evidences of both in the same report? the same proof of the corruption as of the claims? They both hang together. Do not gentlemen themselves admit the existence of the corruption? On what other principle could they justify their proposition to withhold from these harpies the whole of their glorious booty, and put them off with a comparative pittance? Set aside the evidence of the corruption, and it cannot be denied, that instead of five, they are entitled to fifty millions of acres. I repeat they are entitled to all or nothing. We at least are consistent, we deny their title to anything, and we propose to give them nothing. Gentlemen on the other side can support the claim to the five millions, which they propose to give, only by arguments which justify a claim to ten times that amount.

Mr. R. here read the fourth resolution:

“That the good people of Georgia, impressed with general indignation at the act of atrocious perfidy and unparalleled corruption, with a promptitude of decision highly honorable to them, did, by the act of a subsequent Legislature, passed on the 13th day of February, 1796, under circumstances of peculiar solemnity, and finally sanctioned by the people, who have subsequently ingrafted it on their Constitution, declare the preceding act and the grants made under it, in themselves null and void; that the said act should be expunged from the records of the State and publicly burnt—which was accordingly done—provision at the same time being made for restoring the pretended purchase money to the grantees, by whom, or by persons claim- ing under them, the greater part of the said purchase money has been withdrawn from the treasury of Georgia."

This is another of the resolutions not even substantially embraced in the proffered amendment, which has been rejected by the committee. The evidence of the facts contained in the former part of it is to be found in the act of Georgia, which I hold in my hand, commonly called the rescinding act. The report of our Commissioners furnishes the proof of the withdrawal of the money, with a detailed statement of that nefarious business, which in the former stages of this bill has been amply explained. In the rescinding act the Legislature of Georgia take other objections to the usurpation of 1795, besides those founded on its corruption. They deny the Constitutional right of their predecessors to have made such an alienation of the public domain, even with honorable views and for a fair equivalent. They declare that their Constitution prescribes a certain mode whereby vacant lands shall be sold and granted, and that the pretended act of 1795 is void, not only from its corruption, but from its contravening those provisions. This is a weighty and vital objection. The slow yet equitable method known to the constitution of Georgia of laying off new counties, granting out the lands, and when they were appropriated and settled, laying off and settling others, was ill-suited to the gigantic rapacity of the Assembly of 1795 and their ravenous accomplices, who grasped at every acre within the nominal limits of the State, whether covered by Indian titles, or whether those claims were extinguished. [Here Mr. R. read a copious extract from the act of Georgia above-mentioned in support of what he had advanced.] The Committee will see that the whole of this act, so far from being an abandonment of the rights of the State, goes on the ground of asserting and supporting them. It recognises every principle and every fact (the withdrawing of the purchase money excepted, which was posterior to it) contained in those resolutions. Can they then be subversive of the rights of Georgia? Gentlemen of the most tender consciences in relation to State rights have but the alternative of deciding against the act of 1795, or against the act of 1796, of justifying the Assembly of 1795, or supporting that of 1796. Mr. R. here read the fifth resolution, as follows:

"That a subsequent Legislature of an individual State has an undoubted right to repeal any act of a preceding Legislature, provided such repeal be not forbidden by the constitution of such State, nor of the United States."

Can there be a more undeniable position? Mr. R. here read the sixth resolution:

"That the aforesaid act of the State of Georgia (the rescinding act) was forbidden neither by the constitution of that State, nor by that of the United States."

If it were thus forbidden it may easily be shown.

Mr. R. here read the seventh resolution:

"That the claims of persons derived under the aforesaid act (the corrupt act) of the 7th of January, 1795, are recognised, neither by any compact between the United States and the State of Georgia, nor by any act of the Federal Government."

This fact, although none will venture openly to contradict it, has not been sufficiently attended to or understood. I must beg leave in answer to the objection of some gentlemen here, to repeat what was advanced by me in a former discussion of the subject. Georgia ceded this territory to us subject to certain specified claims, arising under Great Britain, under Spain, and under her Bourbon act, as it is commonly called, which has no relation to any of the Yazoo acts, as they are termed. For these claims we have stipulated to provide, moreover paying her a certain sum out of the first proceeds of the lands, as a consideration for the grant. Besides the above-mentioned claims there were others not recognised by, or provided for, in our compact. In relation to these, Georgia gives a reluctant assent, (which is to be inferred as well from the expressions which are used in the treaty as from the declaration of the Commissioners on both sides,) that we may apply, not exceeding five millions of acres to quiet other claims, generally, without specifying what they are—the appropriation not to exceed the amount above, and to be made within six months from the ratification of the compact, or to revert back to Georgia. Among the claims of this vague description may be ranked those of the Virginia and South Carolina Yazoo companies (under the act of Georgia of 1789, and those arising under the corrupt act of 1795.) We are at liberty therefore to give these reserved five millions of acres to either, or to both, of those descriptions of conflicting claimants, but we are certainly not bound to bestow an acre on one of them, either by compact with Georgia, or by our own act of appropriation. When that act passed it was at the close of our session; there was not time to investigate any of these claims. It was then understood that some of them were equitable, and not founded in corruption. If we had not then made the appropriation, the term within which we were permitted to make it, would have elapsed before the next session of Congress. We therefore made the appropriation in the same general terms of our compact with Georgia, pledging ourselves to none, while we thereby reserved the right of examining and recompensing all, in case they should thereafter be found to deserve it. The day of investigation having arrived, you are invited to decline it altogether, and hold that the reservation of the right to give, is converted by some political magic into a duty, and that too by those who propose to give nothing to the companies of 1789, although their claim is embraced by the general provision of our compact with Georgia, and by the terms of our act of appropriation as much as the claims of the companies of 1795. The appropriation, like the compact, referring to neither of them expressly, but to claims other than those English, Spanish, and Georgian claims, (under the Bourbon act,) before mentioned. The position of the seventh resolution, that these claims are recognised neither by any compact between us and Georgia, nor by any act of our own, being thus undeniably established, the conclusion in my mind irresistibly follows from it, and from the preceding facts and principles, "that no part of the five millions of acres reserved for satisfying and quieting claims to the lands ceded by the State of Georgia to the United States, and appropriated by the act of Congress passed at their last session, ought to be appropriated to quiet, or compensate, any claims derived under any act, or pretended act, of the State of Georgia, passed, or alleged to have been passed, during the year 1795."

I cannot perceive the ground on which the opposition to these resolutions has been made. Although some have denied and others have evaded some of their positions, they have been generally admitted as true. The objection that they trench upon the rights of the States seems too futile to justify the opposition they have received. That they are inapplicable to the subject before us, would appear yet less cause for the warmth with which they have been attacked. It is their bearing upon that question, it is their vital connexion with the bill, which seems to constitute the strong objection to them. Gentlemen cannot deny them; they see that they cannot pass the bill before you if they enter up their concurrence with them on your journals; they therefore move to postpone. Be it so. But if they pass the bill in question they do an act which whole ages of political penance will never atone. I have during the whole course of this discussion listened with profound attention, and the words expediency and policy alone have reached my ears. But I cannot comprehend that expediency which would countenance fraud, nor the policy which would foster corruption. During the agitation of this question, in every different shape which it has assumed, I have acted as my conscience and principles impelled me. It will be a source of never-failing self-gratulation that I have done so, as it would have been of remorse had I done otherwise. Whatever be its ultimate fate, it has already abundantly appeared that party spirit, personal influence, and a domineering majority, of which we have so frequently heard, have no existence within these walls but as engines of debate. Such at least is the state of one side of the House. Persons of every political description are marshalled in support of these claims; we have had to contend against the bear of the arctic and the lion of the torrid zone. I have only to wish that those gentlemen who are our opponents may, on returning among their constituents, feel the same pleasure on meeting them which I shall feel; and which I am sure is anticipated by those with whom I have the honor of acting on this occasion.

Mr. BOYD hoped the Committee would not rise before they had decided on the resolutions one by one, and gentlemen allowed a full opportunity of declaring their opinions. He would say for himself that, in his opinion, Congress did not possess the right of censuring the proceedings or taking away the rights of a State. If they acted wrong, their constituents would put them right.

Mr. ELLIOT.—It is certainly unnecessary to reply to the arguments of the gentleman from Virginia. The sense of the House has repeatedly been ascertained upon this subject. I will only observe that the inconsistency which the gentleman believes that he has pointed out in the conduct of those who oppose his resolutions, exists only in his own imagination. We make no decision, we give no opinion, upon either of the acts of the State of Georgia. We carefully avoid that view of the subject, and consider the question as a question of expediency and policy only.

I rejoice to hear, from a gentleman of high political character on this floor, that it is already doubted whether party spirit any longer exists within these walls. But I cannot consider the opinion as the result of cool reflection. Could I believe that this delightful dream of the imagination is to be realized this day, I would hail it as the most auspicious that has beamed upon our country since the declaration of independence. Circumstances of a most imperious nature are constantly occurring, which admonish us to sacrifice our party passions and our ancient prejudices, upon the altar of our country. But many distinguished men have believed that parties are useful in Republics; and the day of their union in our own is yet very distant.

The gentleman from Virginia has apologized to the Committee for that warmth which he so frequently displays, and which, we are told, is occasioned by the adventitious circumstances of constitution and complexion. On this ground, perhaps, the gentleman does not stand alone; and I shall always be as ready as any other member to ask pardon for having injured the feelings of any one. But some of his remarks are very extraordinary. We are told that not only are men of every shade and character of political distinction united in opposition to these resolutions, but even the furious and ferocious animals of the forest; "the bear of the arctic and the lion of the torrid zone;" the bear that roams over the cold regions of the North, and the lion that wanders in groves warmed by the beams of a vertical sun. Was this allusion personal, or otherwise? It is impossible for me to answer the question. But it will be recollected, by those who have read the fables of Æsop, that even the majestic lion, when fallen from his former dignity, was abused by a very inferior animal, an animal distinguished as the emblem of stupidity and folly.

I shall conclude with the observation that the minority will have no just reason of complaint against the majority, if the resolutions should be virtually rejected by the rising of the Committee. The honorable mover has been indulged, on the present occasion, in an elaborate and ingenious argument in support of the resolutions; and other gentlemen, who hold the same opinions, may claim the same privilege.

Mr. SMILIE did not think it of much utility to be spending time about lions and bears. His wish was to consider the subject. When he looked at the resolutions, and the quarter from which they came, he was certain they proceeded from the best motives. He believed, also, it was a respect due to every gentleman to give him an opportunity of supporting any motion he might bring forward; and he should be sorry if this right should be denied. In this instance it had been granted; and the mover of the resolutions had supported them with a degree of ability that did him honor. At the same time, how undoubted soever might be the truth of these remarks, a proposition offered may be of such a nature as to render any expression of opinion by the House improper. It may be improper in point of time, matter, or consequences; and, under such circumstances, a decision may be properly avoided by a motion similar to that before the Committee. This, then, is the simple question, whether it is expedient to decide it at this time on the abstract propositions contained in these resolutions. Those who think it is, will vote against the Committee's rising, while those who hold a different opinion will vote differently. Mr. S. concluded by observing, that he considered the propositions, generally considered, as true; but, he was of opinion that it was improper at the present time to express any opinion respecting them. He should vote, therefore, for the rising of the Committee.

Mr. LUCAS declared himself hostile to any compromise with the claimants.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said he was sorry to be so troublesome; but when he found he entertained different sentiments from a gentleman whom he highly respected, it became incumbent on him to sustain, as well as he could, his own opinions. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated a proposition, which may be true in the abstract; and yet it may not follow that, in this instance, it is not advisable for the Legislative body to express an opinion.

No one would be hardy enough to deny the abstract position laid down by the gentleman, and yet the inference deduced from it may be totally unsustainable. His reasoning amounts to this: Because it is not proper for a Legislative body to express an opinion on an abstract proposition having no connexion with the business before them, if a member should bring forward a proposition that an acid and an alkali united produce a neutral salt, the Committee could, notwithstanding its truth, throw it out. But this is not the nature of the propositions before us? Have they no bearing on the subject under consideration? Because we refuse to express an opinion on abstract motions having no relation to business before us, shall we refuse to express an opinion on subjects that have? Certainly not. Mr. R. said he was rather of the opinion that if these propositions had so little bearing as some gentlemen represented, they would not have received so strenuous an opposition. Had he brought forward a proposition that Lake Erie was the boundary between Canada and the United States, or that a whole was equal to its parts, the Committee would have sneered at its folly or stupidity, and have given it a silent decision. So, if these propositions had been considered trifling or harmless, they would have been easily passed over. But, they are not so considered. They are not, said Mr. R., mere abstract truths; but they probe to the very vitals the question before you; they contain facts which give the death-blow to the claims of 1795. Are specific proofs of corruption abstract propositions? Facts are not abstract propositions. If gentlemen are disposed to doubt them, let them appoint a committee to examine into their truth. Let them not attempt to get under, over, or around the question; but let them meet it. Mr. R. said he was sorry to be deserted by any of his friends, or to desert those with whom it was his honor, on most occasions, to act. Nor was there a gentleman on the floor with whom he differed with a livelier regret than the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SMILIE,) not only from a respect for his political character, which he had known long before he knew him, but because he had heretofore acted with him hand in hand.

Mr. SMILIE observed that his remarks had been applied to the proposition only, and not to the bill.

Mr. RODNEY said he was willing, after the able discussion of his friend from Virginia, with whom it was his pride and pleasure to act, to decline saying anything on the subject. He only wished to have a vote on the resolutions, and to have an opportunity in the House of recording it.

Mr. ELMER could not conceive that gentlemen could reasonably desire any more than a vote on the result of the abstract principles and facts, which had been already decided on. The facts may be true, and the principles likewise, in some senses, but not in others. What can gentlemen require more than the result of facts and principles; and why go into an investigation of facts not necessary to act upon? All that is necessary is so far to decide facts and principles as they are connected with the bill.

The question was then taken on the rising of the Committee, and carried—ayes 57, noes 48.

The Committee accordingly rose and reported in part their agreement to the bill, with a request to have leave to sit again.

An adjournment was moved and lost—ayes 37, noes 57.

On the question of leave being given to the Committee to sit again, Mr. J. RANDOLPH said he presumed the question about to be put was dictated rather by a compliance with form than substance. Is it possible, after the House has sent the resolutions to the Committee and the Committee have refused to act upon them, that they will, by a kind of legerdemain, give them leave to sit again, thus keeping the resolutions exchanged and preventing the sense of the House from being taken on them? I do not believe, said Mr. R., that the House will consent to countenance such a procedure. If this, however, shall be the course pursued, I shall bow on this, as on all other occasions, to the will of a majority; but my submission will flow not from the heart but from necessity. But I cannot bring myself to believe, that after the Committee have refused to act on the resolutions, by declining to do anything more than report the bill, that the House will keep the resolutions in a state of abeyance till they shall be dismissed by an adjournment.

Mr. NICHOLSON said if the mover of the resolutions did not wish the Committee to have leave to sit again, he hoped leave would be refused.

Mr. HOLLAND said he trusted there was no gentleman that could not allow that the resolutions had some bearing on the question before the House. They, in truth, had a very decisive bearing, and Mr. H. said he believed if they were fully investigated, many gentlemen heretofore friendly to the bill would be hostile to it.

Mr. RODNEY hoped the Committee would at present receive leave to sit again. If gentlemen should not hereafter be ready to allow them leave to sit, when the order comes up, they may move to discharge them from the further consideration of the resolutions. As they were then in the possession of the Committee, he hoped their friends would vote in favor of their having leave to sit again.

Mr. EUSTIS hoped the Committee would not obtain leave to sit again. If he understood the decision of the Committee it implied the adoption of the principle that the claims in question may be compensated out of the five millions without investigating the circumstances attending the passage of the acts of Georgia of 1789, 1795, or 1796. Whether this decision is just or honorable will be decided by a higher tribunal than this House. But, if ever respect is due to the decision of a majority, it is in this case, after the opinions of gentlemen have been so fully expressed. Why shall the Committee of the Whole sit again? To debate a proposition, which they have determined not to consider, and which they have declared to have no bearing on the subject before them? There can be no further discussion. Have not these resolutions, so far as regards their substance, been already fully advocated by their friends? It is not only consonant with the principles of justice and honor, that justice which regards the public interest, but it is likewise consonant with the rules of the House that when a bill and certain resolutions are referred, and the bill reported, which amounts to a supercession of the resolutions, that leave should be refused to the Committee to sit again. The resolutions, in this instance, were referred as the groundwork of a system hostile to the bill. They were intended to declare the act of Georgia invalid, as a reason for rejecting the bill. If such had been the desire of the House, would they not have suspended the bill, and have given the resolutions the investigation they merited? By taking up the bill, and rejecting the substance of the resolutions, the Committee have given a proper satisfaction to the mover and his friends. It is a misfortune that, on this question, those who generally act together are divided; but it is a misfortune from which no Legislative body, or set of men, is exempt. When such occasions do occur, it is the duty of the minority to submit, and not by unnecessary opposition to widen the difference. If one gentleman is strong in his own opinion, he should have candor and indulgence for those who differ from him, and may feel equal conviction of the truth of their own belief. A disposition to leave the ground of reason appears to me always to have a tendency to draw the attention of the House from the merits of the question, and to lead it astray from the path of duty. It is not my personal interest, said Mr. E., to advocate or oppose these claims. I have no expectation of gain from their allowance or rejection. But, while I allow to other gentlemen a sacred regard to the public good, a sense of public duty, of honor, and of justice, I claim the same respect for myself and those who act with me, however different our opinions on this particular point. We are as conscious of our integrity as those who oppose us. I am sorry the character of this debate compels me to declare that I can consider no observation made during the course of it as personally applicable to me; and I wish that the same were the case with other gentlemen. There is, indeed, cause for regret that anything urged on this occasion should have been considered personal. For myself it is my practice to urge arguments grounded on the nature of the case, and not on the passions or prejudices of others; and, while I extend this right to others, I claim it for myself.

With regard to the resolutions, they have been fully discussed by the mover and his friends. I consider some of them as containing abstract propositions from which the House cannot dissent, as being universal principles in politics; others as of a doubtful nature; but the whole of them, so far as they are applied to the Legislature of a State, unwarrantable, impolitic, not to say unconstitutional. But I will say, when this House adopts the language of abstract propositions and applies it to the Legislature of a particular State, we tread on dangerous ground. If it be said, we barely speak our opinions, I ask whether we came here for that purpose? No; we came here to legislate. If the language is intended to apply to the Legislature of a particular State, I inquire whether this House possesses any such power? Is it thereby intended to warn one State of her course of proceeding? Is it intended to guard any other State against it? If so, the act is unconstitutional. Should, therefore, the resolutions be proposed again and again, with my present view of the subject, I shall consider it my duty to move the previous question. I am unwilling to decide upon them. The more I consider them, the more unwilling I find myself. They point to the specific act of a sovereign State. May there not be other acts of other States equally reprehensible; and can we justify to ourselves as an impartial body the passing on one and not on all? Are there not other Legislatures who have disposed of the public lands in cases where their own members were part owners? If there are, will not this be an act of partiality?

I hope I shall not be understood as the advocate of the Georgia transaction, or of any part of it, or of other Legislatures who have pursued a similar course. No; I am of opinion that it is inconsistent with the honor and duty of a legislator to convey land with one hand and receive it with another. But I appeal to gentlemen whether this has not been the practice? Knowing it to have been the practice, I am unwilling to express the abhorrence I feel of this act, because such an expression of opinion goes to involve others in guilt, in cases where no such right of crimination constitutionally belongs to Congress.

The course we are now pursuing is the true course, that which is founded in justice and in sound policy. *It is to cover the transaction without approving it; to pass the whole of its scenes over in silence. Whereas we cannot consider the resolutions without going to the marrow of this foul wound, which every dictate of policy and wisdom prompts us to conceal. I consider this course as going forever to close this offensive wound; to bury it in eternal oblivion. With this view I made the motion. It is immaterial to me whether the Committee be refused leave to sit again, or be discharged from a consideration of the resolutions. So long as the resolutions live, I will with zeal oppose their consideration, without saying that I will bring the House to a vote. A gentleman may propose what he pleases, but it is for the House to dispose of it. I will oppose their consideration, because I see in them nothing of public utility; because they are a source of personal irritation; and because wisdom dictates that the whole transaction to which they relate should be thrown into oblivion.

Mr. DAWSON concisely advocated the consideration of the resolutions; he thought it but fair that an opportunity should be given to their friends to support them.

Mr. SMILIE said he had avoided, through the whole of the discussion, considering the merits of the resolutions. He would state, at this time, one reason why he was unwilling to vote upon them. Congress should be extremely careful, when they were establishing their own rights, not to violate the rights of others. These resolutions declare the act of Georgia under which the claims in question are preferred, a nullity. I ask, what will be the effect of this declaration on the claims when they are brought before a court of justice? Can they have the same chance of justice after this solemn decision of the House of Representatives of the Union? It is acknowledged to be wrong to bias a jury; and it is well known that printers are punished for publications during a pending suit. Can anything they may publish have such an effect as the decision of the National Legislature? This is the reason, said Mr. S., why I am reluctant to express any opinion on these resolutions.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH inquired whether, if leave were refused to the Committee of the Whole to sit again, the resolutions would not therefore be considered as before the House?

The SPEAKER said they would.

On granting leave, the yeas and nays were taken, and were—yeas 3, nays 101, as follows:

[This question, from the unexpected turn which the debate took, and its irrelevancy to the main points under discussion, viz: the expediency of considering Mr. RANDOLPH's resolutions, and the justice or policy of compromising claims under the act of Georgia, of 1795, decided nothing: particularly as it was previously declared by the Chair that, in case leave was refused to the Committee to sit again, the resolutions would thereupon be in possession of the House.]

Mr. J. RANDOLPH immediately moved that the House should take up the resolutions for consideration, and called for the yeas and nays on the motion.

A member inquired, whether it was not first in order to consider the report of the Committee agreeing to the bill?

The SPEAKER said, Mr. RANDOLPH's motion, being first made, must be first considered.

An unsuccessful motion having been made to adjourn, the question was taken by yeas and nays, on considering the resolutions, and carried affirmatively—yeas 57, nays 46, as follows:

THURSDAY, March 8.

Mr. NICHOLSON, a member of this House for the State of Maryland, informed the House of the death of his colleague, General DANIEL HEISTER, late one of the members of the said State, in this House: Whereupon,

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of this House will attend at Lovell's hotel, this day, at one o'clock, for the purpose of following in procession the body of the late General DANIEL HEISTER, a part of the way to the place of interment at Hagerstown.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of the said DANIEL HEISTER by wearing a crape on the left arm for one month.

On motion,

Resolved, That the SPEAKER address a letter to the Executive of the State of Maryland, to inform them of the death of DANIEL HEISTER, late a member of this House, in order that measures may be taken to supply the vacancy occasioned thereby.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee appointed the sixth instant, presented a bill in addition to "An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole tomorrow.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, enclosing a letter from Governor Claiborne, respecting the importation at New Orleans of slaves from Africa, and his impression that he did not possess power to interpose respecting the same.

The Message, together with the extracts of letters transmitted therewith, were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee appointed on the thirteenth of January last, presented a bill for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHILL, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to repeal a part of the act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Petitions of sundry inhabitants of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, were presented to the House and read, respectively stating their approbation of the principles contained in a bill now depending before the House to amend the charter of Georgetown; also, praying that the petitioners and other inhabitants of Georgetown, may be exonerated from taxation for the County of Washington, in the said District; and further, that the Corporation of the said town may be authorized to appoint the inspectors of tobacco, with the use and application of the surplus money arising therefrom, to build a poor house; and to impose a tax, and collect the same for the support of the poor.

Ordered, That the said petitions be severally referred to a Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the twenty seventh ultimo, the bill to amend the charter of Georgetown.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, presented to the House a deposition thereon, of David Robertson, of the State of Virginia; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the sixth instant, the report of the aforesaid Committee of Inquiry.

An engrossed bill supplemental to the act, entitled "An act concerning the City of Washington," was read the third time and passed.

EXPLORATION OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHILL, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who were instructed by a resolution of this House, of the eighteenth ultimo, "to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to employ persons to explore such parts of the province of Louisiana as he may deem proper," made a report thereon; which was read, and is as follows:

By a series of memorable events the United States have lately acquired a large addition of soil and jurisdiction. This is believed, besides the tracts on the east side of the Mississippi, to include all the country which lies to the westward between that river and the great chain of mountains that stretch from north to south, and divide the waters running into the Atlantic from those which empty into the Pacific Ocean; and beyond that chain between the territories claimed by Great Britain on the one side, and by Spain on the other, quite to the South Sea.

It is highly desirable that this extensive region should be visited, in some parts, at least, by intelligent men. Important additions might thereby be made to the science of geography. Various materials might thence be derived to augment our knowledge of natural history. The Government would thence acquire correct information of the situation, extent, and worth of its own dominions, and individuals of research and curiosity would receive ample gratification as to the works of art and productions of nature which exist in those boundless tracts.

There is no need of informing the House that already an expedition, authorized by Congress at the second session of the seventh Congress, has been actually undertaken, and is going on, under the President's direction, up the Missouri. The two enterprising conductors of this adventure, Captains Lewis and Clark, have been directed to attempt a passage to the western shore of the South Sea; from them, on their return in 1805, a narrative full of instruction may be expected. It is also understood that a survey has been ordered to be made of the Mississippi, from the mouth of the Ohio to the falls of Saint Anthony. Of this a correct map may be expected within a reasonable time. The like also is hoped, in the course of a moderate period, from the latter place to the source of the Mississippi, and thence to the Lake of the Woods.

Men of political research have, in like manner, long known that the course of the Mississippi downwards to the Gulf of Mexico, has been well delineated by Captain Hutchings; and that more recently, by the assiduous observations of Mr. Ellicot, the turnings and windings of that river, southward of its junction with the Ohio, and the territorial line on the 31st degree of north latitude, to the northwestern angle of Florida, have been exhibited in a perspicuous and scientific manner. Along the coast of the ocean too, from Perdido Bay to the Bay of Saint Bernard, navigators have viewed the shores and coast so often that there is little left to explore.

But, although there is so much really known, or in a train of investigation, concerning Louisiana, there are still some parts upon which it would be desirable to possess additional information. The tracts alluded to are those which remain principally in their original obscurity, and strongly attract the eye of the adventurer. Their pathless forests may be advantageously penetrated along the channels of the Arkansas and the Red Rivers, two of those large and long water-courses which intersect them. An expedition of discovery up these prodigious streams and their branches might redound as much to the honor, and more to the interest of our Government, than the voyages by sea round the terra-queous globe have done for the polished nations of Europe who authorized them. Such liberal enterprises will befit the present season of prosperity, and may be expected to succeed best during the reign of peace.

The Red River was visited many years ago, and even settled as high as Natchitoches. This old establishment is laid down in some of the maps, as being only seven leagues distant from the station of Adais, the capital of the province of Texas, and situated on the river Mexicano. Red River is described as difficult to ascend when the waters are low; but when high a traveller may, by means of them, penetrate where he pleases. More than half a century ago, it was said that along its banks were many inferior lakes and drowned lands, that abounded with alligators and fishes; that its shores were inhabited by plenty of bisons, tigers, wolves, deer, and several other species of untamed beasts; as well as by turkeys, geese, swans, ducks, and other kind of wild fowl; and that all manner of indigenous fruit trees and grape vines sprout up luxuriantly from the soil. To these accounts, which are common to most other parts of the American wilderness when first visited by civilised men, other facts and considerations are now to be added. The nation has been lately told, on respectable authority, that the Red River is navigable by boats one thousand miles beyond Natchitoches. It is reported to run through a country abounding in rich prairies, where neat cattle and horses range in innumerable herds, as independent as the natural inhabitants. There is reason to presume the head of this stream lies concealed in the southwestern corner of the newly ceded territory. The limits of Louisiana in that quarter are obscure and undefined. And it is worthy of Legislative consideration, whether the latitude and longitude of the Red River source ought not to be ascertained under the authority of the nation. It may be expected that individuals will venture upon such undertakings for the gratification of their own speculative curiosity, and by discreet management the journeys of such persons will minister to the national wants, and to general instruction, with but a trifling appropriation from the Treasury.

The Arkansas, which has been already traced above one thousand miles, also seems worthy of being explored with more care and to a greater extent than has hitherto been done. A spacious plain and valley incrustated annually (like the soil in some spots about the Persian Gulf) with native salt, in quantity sufficient to impregnate a branch of the Arkansas, and occasionally the river into which it falls, with its briny quality, and to make it a salt river down to the settlement of Ouizarque, for considerably more than six hundred miles of its course, might be mentioned as no ordinary occurrences. The masses of virgin silver and gold that glitter in the veins of the rocks which underlay the Arkansas itself, and mingle with the minerals near certain other of its streams, and offer themselves to the hand of him who will gather, refine, and convert them to use, are no less uncommon and wonderful. These extraordinary productions might be dwelt upon at considerable length, in this report; but, credible as both the relations are, the committee forbear to offer anything more than that the existence of a salt river, precious mines and ores, and of some other remarkable objects, are stated upon solid and credible testimony. Omitting these things, as not necessary to be urged to Congress, the committee consider that the latitude, longitude, and relative situation of the source of the Arkansas, are themselves of sufficient moment to render their attainment very desirable.

Without writing a sentence on the advantages of tracing the streams of the Black river, the White river, the Mexicano, and of other rivers, to their sources, the committee submit the following opinion:

That it will be honorable and useful to make some public provision for further exploring the extent, and ascertaining the boundaries of Louisiana: and,

That a sum not exceeding — dollars be appropriated for enabling the President of the United States to cause surveys and observations to be made on the Red river and the Arkansas, or either of them, or elsewhere in Louisiana, as he shall think proper, for these purposes.

The report was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

FRIDAY, March 9.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, of the twenty-seventh ultimo, to whom was referred the petition of Moses White and Charlotte Hazen, executor and executrix of Moses Hazen, deceased; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their agreement to the same.

The House then proceeded to consider the said report of the Committee of Claims at the Clerk's table; and so much as is contained in the last clause thereof, being twice read, in the words following, to wit:

"From an attentive consideration of the case, your committee are of opinion the prayer of the petition is reasonable, and ought to be granted."

The question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the Whole in their agreement to the said last clause of the report, and resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in pursuant thereto; and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, of the twenty-seventh of January, on the petition of Lachlin McIntosh and Joseph Habersham, of the State of Georgia; to which Committee of the whole House was also referred a report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on the petition of the executors of John Habersham, deceased, made the twenty-seventh of February last; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported two resolutions thereupon; which were severally read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to direct credit to be given to the late Collector of Savannah, to the amount of eleven hundred and eleven dollars and eighteen cents.

Resolved, That the proper officers of the Treasury be authorized to pass to the credit of John Habersham, late Collector of Savannah, in Georgia, the amount of two orders or bills drawn in his favor by Edward Price, and one of them endorsed by William Wallace; the former upon Oliver Wolcott, Secretary of the Treasury, and the other upon James McHenry, Secretary of War, making together the sum of two thousand one hundred and twenty-four dollars and fifty-three cents.

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in, pursuant to the said resolutions; and that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making an appropriation for defraying the expenses incurred in inquiring into the official conduct of Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, and in conducting the impeachment against John Pickering; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said Committee; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with several amendments thereto, which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. SMILIE offered a resolution directing a call of the House every morning at ten o'clock, during the remainder of the session, connected with a forfeiture of one day's pay for each neglect of duty. Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, moved the following resolution, which was referred to a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the government of Louisiana.

"Resolved, That it is expedient to make provision, by law, to declare void and of no effect, all grants for land in the Territory of Louisiana, ceded to the United States by the French Republic, by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, in the year eighteen hundred and three, which have been issued by any authority, or pretended authority from the Government of Spain, subsequent to the Treaty of St. Ildefonso."

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred, during the present session, a memorial of Samuel J. Cabell of the State of Virginia, complaining of an undue election of THOMAS MANN RANDOLPH, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the said State; and, also, sundry depositions and other papers transmitted from the counties of Amherst, Albemarle, and Fluvanna, in the State of Virginia, in the case of the said contested election; made a report thereon, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

"That having examined the depositions and papers referred to them, they discover that the land lists of all the counties of which the district is composed are wanting, and the list of voters of all the counties but one, (viz: Fluvanna county) are also wanting. The Committee also inform the House, that, by letters from the memorialist of the thirteenth of October, and third of November, the Committee were requested not to proceed until he could procure and transmit further documents. That by another letter from the memorialist of the fifth of January, accompanied with a protest against documents then before the Committee, he again made a request that the Committee would defer taking the subject under consideration. Afterwards the memorialist was notified, by the direction of the Committee, to be prepared, and to attend the Committee himself, or by his agent, in order to obtain a decision. He has not complied with the notification, and the Committee observe no facts, from examining the documents submitted to them, sufficient to invalidate the claim, or set aside the return of Thomas M. Randolph.

"Therefore, the Committee are of opinion that Thos. M. Randolph, returned as a member for the Congressional District composed of the counties of Albemarle, Amherst, and Fluvanna, in the State of Virginia, is entitled to his seat in the House."

No further proceedings took place upon this report.

GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the government of Louisiana. The fifth section being read, as follows:

"SEC. 5. The judicial power shall be vested in a superior court, and in such inferior courts, and justices of the peace, as the Legislature of the Territory may, from time to time, establish. The judges of the superior court, and the justices of the peace, shall hold their offices for the term of four years. The superior court shall consist of three judges, any one of whom shall constitute a court. They shall have jurisdiction in all criminal cases, and exclusive jurisdiction in all those which are capital, and original and appellate jurisdiction in all civil cases of the value of one hundred dollars. Its sessions shall commence on the first Monday of every month, and continue till all the business depending before them shall be disposed of. They shall appoint their own clerk. In all criminal prosecutions which are capital, the trial shall be by a jury of twelve good and lawful men of the vicinage; and in all cases, criminal and civil, in the superior court, the trial shall be by a jury, if either of the parties require it. The inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus; they shall be bailable, unless for capital offences, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great; and no cruel and unusual punishments shall be inflicted."

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL moved to strike out "which are capital, the trial shall be by a jury of twelve good and lawful men of the vicinage; and in all cases, criminal and civil, in the superior court, the trial shall be by a jury, if either of the party require it," and to insert "the trial shall be by jury, and in all civil cases above the value of twenty dollars."

Mr. C. said he conceived that in legislating for the people of Louisiana, they were bound by the Constitution of the United States, and that they had not a right to establish courts in that Territory on any other terms than they could in any of the States. Wherever courts were established in a Territory, they must be considered as courts of the United States, and of consequence cannot be otherwise constituted than as courts in the States. The Constitution expressly declares that, in criminal cases the trial shall be by jury, and in all civil cases where the sum in controversy exceeds the value of twenty dollars, the trial shall be likewise by jury. In the ninth article of the amendments to the Constitution, we find the following words: "In suits at common law where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved. The eighth article says: "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury."

I will observe that the right of trial given by this section, to wit: "if either of the parties require it," is a dangerous mode of proceeding, and may tend unwarily to entrap them. The person brought before the court for a misdemeanor, asked if he requires a jury trial, may be ignorant of the evidence, and may not know the benefits of a trial by jury; he must at all events show a want of confidence in the court, or waive a jury trial. If he does the first, he may sour the minds of the court. The party is thus put in a situation which may be worse than if he was deprived altogether of the right of a trial, by the necessity of making a choice which may operate more against him. The bill therefore does not secure the right of a jury trial, as contemplated by the Constitution.

Mr. SLOAN said a few words in support of the motion, which was lost—yeas 20.

[At this stage of the business we attended the trial of impeachment in the Senate, and cannot with perfect correctness state the further proceedings of the House on the bill. We understand, however, that the new section, sometime since offered by Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL, providing for the election of a Legislature by the people of Louisiana, instead of their being governed according to the bill from the Senate, by a council appointed by the President, was disagreed to—yeas 37, nays 43.—Reporter.]

SATURDAY, March 10.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented, according to order, a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of the late General Moses Hazen, deceased; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. THOMAS M. RANDOLPH, from the committee to whom was referred, on the twenty-sixth of January, the petition of William Dunbar, of the Mississippi Territory of the United States, and to whom was recommended, on the third of February last, the petition of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Assistants, of the city of Natchez, in the said Mississippi Territory, together with a report of a committee thereon, made a supplementary report; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the execution of so much of the twelfth section of the act passed the third of March, 1803, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," as directs the Governor of the Mississippi Territory to locate lots in the city of Natchez, and a piece of land adjoining thereto, (if the property of the United States,) for the use of the Jefferson College, be suspended until farther order be taken thereon by Congress.

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. THOMAS, M. RANDOLPH, Mr. ALSTON, and Mr. LATIMORE, do prepare and bring in the same.

An engrossed bill making appropriation for defraying the expenses incurred in inquiring into the official conduct of Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, and in conducting the impeachment against John Pickering, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate, in their capacity of a Court of Impeachments, will, on Monday next, at twelve o'clock, proceed to pronounce judgment on the articles of impeachment exhibited against John Pickering.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims, of the twenty-ninth ultimo, on the petition of William Eaton; and so much of the said report as is contained in the last clause thereof, being twice read at the Clerk's table, in the words following, to wit:

"Your committee are therefore of opinion, that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition, and the papers accompanying the same;"

The question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of Claims in their agreement to the said last clause of the report, and resolved in the affirmative.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1804:" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendment.

MR. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred, on the second instant, two reports of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures; one "on laying a tonnage duty on foreign ships and vessels, to be denominated light money;" the other on various memorials and petitions for the encouragement of domestic acts, trades, and manufactures;" presented a bill imposing more specific duties on the importation of certain articles; and also, for levying and collecting light money on foreign ships and vessels; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate agree to the first, second, and fourth amendments proposed by this House to the bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to erect a light-house on the south end of St. Simon's island, in the State of Georgia, and for the placing a buoy or buoys on or near St. Simon's bar," with an amendment to the said fourth amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of the House. The Senate disagree to the third amendment by this House to add a new section at the end of the said bill.

GEORGIA CLAIMS.

MR. J. RANDOLPH moved the taking up for consideration the resolution offered by him on the claims under the act of Georgia of 1795.

MR. ELLIOT moved the order of the day on the bill for the compromise of those and other claims.

MR. GREGG moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolutions till the first day of December next. He was, he said, perfectly prepared to act on the bill for the settlement of the claims, and to give it his decided negative; and should have no objections, but for the lateness of the session, and the great mass of important business that demanded attention.

The SPEAKER said, the motion to consider the resolutions, being first made, must be first put.

It accordingly was put, and carried—yeas 58.

MR. JACKSON then moved a postponement of the resolutions until the 1st Monday in December.

MR. STANFORD inquired whether the motion of postponement was not susceptible of a division, so as to apply to each resolution separately.

MR. J. RANDOLPH hoped the question would be so taken.

MR. RODNEY expressed the same wish, and that the yeas and nays might be taken on each division of the question. He was opposed to a postponement. He should not have risen at this late period but for the warm opposition the resolutions had received from various quarters, and but for his desire to avail himself of the opportunity to state his reasons for giving them a firm support. [MR. R. was interrupted by an inquiry whether his remarks were in order before the Chair had decided on the divisibility of the motion to postpone. MR. JOHN RANDOLPH remarked that whenever a question was susceptible of division, it might be divided as a matter of right.]

MR. VARNUM asked if a motion were made to postpone certain resolutions, or a bill, whether it would be divided so as to apply to a part only of the bill or the resolutions?

MR. JACKSON said the motion is to postpone the resolutions generally. A major proposition must include the minor, and cannot be susceptible of division. If a member were to move a postponement of one of the resolutions, a motion to postpone the whole would supersede it.

Messrs. ELLIOT and EUSTIS were of opinion that the motion did not admit of division.

The SPEAKER said it had been the practice of the House to commit a particular section. He considered the motion divisible.

The question having been stated on the postponement of the first resolution to the first Monday of December—

MR. RODNEY rose.—I was about, said he, when interrupted by an inquiry relating to a point of order, taking advantage of the opportunity afforded to give my reasons in support of the resolutions under consideration. I had observed that they experienced such a variety of objections, and from such a variety of quarters, that notwithstanding it was my intention to have given them a silent vote, and to have relied on the able manner in which they had been supported by my worthy friend from Virginia, I felt it my duty to remain no longer silent. My friend from Massachusetts has endeavored to interest the feelings of the House by awakening their compassion to the claims of those who have innocently suffered. I will only remark, in reply to such addresses to our feelings, that justice has the first right to be heard. Be just before you are generous, is a maxim consecrated by time and humanity; though an acknowledged virtue is of an inferior order, it may be the second virtue which a Legislative body ought to possess, but justice is the first. In the course of this discussion when reason failed, resort has been had to other means, and a too liberal disposition to use personal recrimination has been indulged. I am pleased, however, to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts declare here that the warmth displayed on this occasion ought not to affect the personal feelings of individual members, and I am happy that this sentiment pervades every part of the House. I shall therefore pass by the sallies of the imagination which we have heard, as we do the flights of our pigeons who leave their owners animo revertendi, and return to the subject. I shall pass by the fable of the lion, without reversing it; nor shall I allude to another fable relating to that noble animal, and to a reptile who, having found under him a shelter from danger, attempted to sting him.

It is objected to these resolutions that they are abstract propositions. By abstract principles, I understand axioms unapplied. But when they are applied to facts, they cease to be considered in the abstract. In geometry there are certain elementary principles which are the basis of all reasoning on any proposition in that department of science. So in law there are principles in the abstract while they remain unapplied, and which bear in every case where facts admit of their application. So in politics certain principles are held sacred, either in the view of right, or in relation to the constitution of a State. But when these principles are applied to a given state of things, they cease to be abstract. In the Declaration of Independence there are several abstract principles, such as "that all men are free," &c. But when applied to a certain state of things, they are no longer abstract. I apprehend, therefore, that my worthy friend from Pennsylvania will, on more mature reflection, perceive that the principles contained in the resolutions bearing on facts cease to be abstract; on facts which it is necessary for us to decide, and against examining the consequences of which no reason can be urged. But says another gentleman, we have no jurisdiction in the case; we have nothing to do with the act of Georgia of 1795; we have no authority over it. I confess myself really surprised to be assured, over and over again, that the act of 1795, which gives the House all this trouble, is the corner stone of the present claims, and without which there would not be a shadow of claim, is not to be considered as blended with our proceedings. What! when we are called upon to compromise claims, are we not to go to the cause, to the fountain source, and decide whether they have, or have not, a foundation in justice? Put the act of 1795 out of the way, and would we have ever heard of this compromise? Remove it, and would we have a single claimant before us soliciting a compromise? I consider the act, to Georgia, as involving the all-important point; as intimately and indissolubly blended with the question before us. That question is whether we will consent to give five millions to effect a compromise of claims, directly emanating from the act of 1795; and then, as an incidental question, we are obliged to look at the act of 1795. If the House have authority over the main question, ex vi termini, they have authority over every question incidental to it; and common sense teaches us that it is absolutely necessary to determine on the validity of the act of 1795, in order to decide the justice or policy of compromising claims arising out of it.

MARCH, 1804.

Georgia Claims.

H. OF R.

But says the gentleman from Massachusetts, the United States are pledged to compensate these claimants by the articles of agreement made with Georgia, and by the act of Congress passed at a late session: and he wishes us to drop the curtain over this scene of iniquity. I should be as glad as that gentleman to do it, but I wish to know who raised it, and whether the first act in this dark drama is not the act of 1795, and whether this did not, in the first instance, raise the curtain? I wish to examine the validity of this act. Is there anything in the articles of cession that contravenes its validity? My worthy friend from Virginia has frequently called the attention of the House to that instrument. I will again invite it. By the third article it is—

"Provided, That all the lands ceded by this agreement to the United States, shall, after satisfying the above-mentioned payment of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the State of Georgia, and the grants recognised by the preceding condition, be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever: Provided, however, That the United States, for the period and until the end of one year after the assent of Georgia to the boundary established by this agreement shall have been declared, may, in such manner as not to interfere with the above-mentioned payment to the State of Georgia, nor with the grants hereinbefore recognised, dispose of or appropriate a portion of the said lands, not exceeding five millions of acres, or the proceeds of the said five millions of acres, or of any part thereof, for the purpose of satisfying, quieting, or compensating for any claims other than those hereinbefore recognised, which may be made to the said lands, or to any part thereof. It being fully understood, that if an act of Congress making such disposition or appropriation shall not be passed into a law within the above-mentioned period of one year, the United States shall not be at liberty thereafter to cede any part of the said lands on account of claims which may be laid to the same, other than those recognised by the preceding condition, nor to compensation for the same; and in case of any such cession or compensation, the present cession of Georgia to the right of soil over the lands thus ceded or compensated for, shall be considered as null and void, and the lands thus ceded or compensated for shall revert to the State of Georgia."

It must be evident from the plain reading of this article, that Georgia did not contemplate on her part to pay, nor wish the United States to pay the claimants. She ties the United States down to a certain time, and if afterwards she undertakes to appropriate one acre to their satisfaction, the whole reverts to Georgia. Is there any specific recognition of claims in the instrument? Is there any covenant to pay the claimants under the act of 1795? We find nothing in the letter of the articles of cession to warrant it; and we must conclude that there is no promise made by the United States to compensate the claimants under that act. But say gentlemen, this is to be found in the act of the last session. I think that act establishes no such thing, and that those claims are not recognised, or intended to be recognised by it; for it explicitly declares in the eighth section:

"That so much of the five millions of acres reserved for that purpose by the articles of agreement above-mentioned, as may be necessary to satisfy the claims not confirmed by that agreement, which are embraced by the two first sections of this act, or which may be derived from British grants for lands which have not been regranted by the Spanish Government, be, and the same is hereby appropriated for that purpose, and so much of the residue of the said five millions of acres, or of the net proceeds thereof as may be necessary for that purpose, shall be and is hereby appropriated for the purpose of satisfying, quieting, and compensating, for such other claims to the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee not recognised in the above-mentioned articles of agreement, and which are derived from any act or pretended act of the State of Georgia, which Congress may hereafter think fit to provide for: Provided, however, That no other claims shall be embraced by this appropriation, but those, the evidence of which shall have, on or before the first day of January next, been exhibited by the claimants to the Secretary of State, and recorded in books to be kept in his office for that purpose, at the expense of the party exhibiting the same, who shall pay to the person employed by the Secretary of State for recording the same, at the rate of twelve and a half cents for every hundred words contained in each document thus recorded; nor shall any grant, deed, conveyance, or other written evidence of any claim to the said lands, derived or pretended to be derived, from the State of Georgia, and not recognised by the above-mentioned articles of agreement, ever after be admitted or considered as evidence in any of the courts of the United States, unless it shall have been exhibited and recorded in the manner and within the time above-mentioned."

From this view I think it must be obvious to every person who has considered the articles of cession and the act of Congress, that neither in the one nor the other are these claims recognised as valid. They are both very far from containing any covenant to compensate or compromise them. I know that truth is only to be sought by a slow and painful process, while error is very compendious and easy. We can with great ease hop and skip over truth and perch upon assertion, and call it truth. But where shall we find in the articles of cession or the act of Congress any obligation to render compensation for these claims? We can find nothing. No such idea is inculcated. While we may find abundant proof to satisfy us that this assumption is without foundation, and cannot be supported.

Having settled, as I conceive, these preliminary points, I will call the attention of the House to the great point on which their decision must turn. Either the act of 1795 or of 1796 is in force. If that of 1795 is in force the claimants have a legal title to unascertained millions. If that act is not binding, they have no claim at all. If that act is of no authority, there is an end of their title. The tree is cut up by the roots, and all its branches fall. They have either then a title to fifty millions, or they have no title at all. Their case cannot be compared to a common saying, which declares half a loaf better than no bread.

Now let us compare these facts and reasonings with the resolutions. When I rose I intended to have taken them up in order, but as I have been diverted by the course of the argument, I shall pursue the track I have taken. One of the resolutions states "that a subsequent Legislature of 'an individual State has an undoubted right to repeal any act of a preceding Legislature, provided such repeal be not forbidden by the constitution of such State, or of the United States.'"

This is, I think, a plain and clear axiom. Both Legislatures flow from the same source, and are armed with equal powers. What one Legislature can do, another may undo, if the interest of the public prescribes it. I know an ingenious distinction is taken, as to the power of a Legislative body, between municipal acts and those constituting contracts. The distinction holds to a certain degree as to expediency, but not as to power. When a Legislative body forms a contract, it is a solemn thing, and it ought not to be touched, except when the private evil arising from its being annulled should rather be endured than the public calamity arising from its continuance. But still the position of the resolution is perfectly tenable. What one Legislature has done another may undo; what one has enacted, a subsequent one may repeal.

Let us examine whether there is anything in the rescinding act of Georgia at variance with the constitution of that State, or the Constitution of the United States. The whole course of the business shows the previous act to have been a violation of the constitution of Georgia. The Constitution of the United States declares that no State "shall pass any ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts." That no contract has been impaired, is evident from attending to the sense of the word. I know of no contract formed, either in a legal or equitable sense. Did the constitution of Georgia authorize her Representatives to rob the people of their property? Or did it authorize them only to dispose of it for their welfare? If they had a right to dispose of it in a wrongful manner, it knocks up the argument at once. If they were vested with a right to rob and plunder their constituents, I give up the point. But until this is shown I shall remain of opinion that they only had the right of disposing of it for the general good. I am not about to travel through the fruitful wilderness of inquiry disclosed in the progress of this affair. But gentlemen say that we have no evidence of corruption. What do they want more than we possess? The whole business has been referred to a set of Commissioners, whose comprehensive powers embraced an investigation of every claim. They have fully examined the claims under the act of 1795, and they have reported that—

"A comparison of the schedule annexed to the articles, and which is declared to be a part of the agreement, with the yeas and nays on the passage of the act authorizing the sale, (E,) shows that all the members, both in the Senate and House, who voted in favor of the law, were, with one single exception, (Robert Watkins, whose name does not appear) interested in, and parties to, the purchase.

"The articles of agreement, and list of associates of the Tennessee company, which have been voluntarily furnished by one of the trustees, shows that a number of members of the Legislature were also interested in that company."

This stubborn fact appears on the face of a report made by persons duly authorized to investigate the whole transaction. The fact is indisputable, and ought to satisfy the most reluctant and unwilling mind of the enormity of the corruption attending this business. It is fully satisfactory to my mind. But it is said that this statement is founded on ex parte depositions, and that no opportunity has been allowed to cross-examine the witnesses. But where were they taken? In Georgia; in probably the same House that witnessed the scene of disgrace; by a tribunal competent to take them and to inquire into facts. But say gentlemen, admitting the facts to be true, the subsequent rescinding act of Georgia was unjustifiable and is invalid; and, notwithstanding a majority of those who framed it were corrupted, it is a binding law. I do not know, as I have before stated, any case strictly analogous to this. But I consider it as an universal principle that fraud vitiates every contract, and that consequently if this contract was entered into fraudulently, it was null from the moment of its formation. If a Legislature should authorize a man to make a fraudulent conveyance, and he should make it, will gentlemen say that it would be valid. They will not. But say gentlemen there are parties who are innocent. I lament as much as any one that persons of this description are likely to suffer. But a grant void at the period of its formation cannot be valid at any subsequent stage. Void in its creation, no validity can accrue to acts under it. But gentlemen ask if we have ever heard of a case in which two parties are equally guilty of one taking advantage of the other? The general principle of the law is that where both parties are equally guilty of a fraud, the one in possession is in the best condition. A usurer cannot plead his usurious bond and get possession of the property pledged for its payment. So if a contract be made to dispose of land for a corrupt purpose, the party in possession may show the fraud and keep the land and money. Why is this principle established? In order to prevent the parties from practising fraud, which is most effectually done by declaring that neither of the parties practising a fraud shall receive a helping hand from the law.

The opinion that the rescinding act is not obligatory is as novel as unfounded. Has it not been declared obligatory by the Legislature and Convention of Georgia? Have not the Commissioners likewise declared it valid in saying "that under all the circumstances which may affect the case, as they have come within their knowledge, the title of the claimants (under the act of 1796) cannot be supported." Has not Congress authorized the Commissioners to purchase the territory? In what situation then is the House placed provided the act of 1795 is valid? Are they not a set of land-jobbers? Have they not purchased land from Georgia which she had no right to sell? Are they not at this moment, in proposing to give a part only of the lands conveyed by the act of 1795, declaring that act void as much so as if they gave none? I cannot conceive in what point of view the subject can be placed without coming to the conclusion that the act of 1795 is void; and the proceedings of the House show their perfect unanimity on this point; otherwise some gentlemen would be in favor of giving the whole fifty millions.

But we are told it is politic to satisfy the claimants because they may be troublesome; they may bring ejectments and prevent the disposal of the public lands. Let us see if there is no remedy against this evil, and whether it is not pointed out by the act of the last session. Provision is there-in made for registering and recording claims on the United States under the acts of Georgia. This provision goes to a great extent; it declares that unless the claimants observe certain forms they shall be debarred from giving evidence of their validity in any of the courts of the United States. If then Congress have power to declare the claims subject to certain forms, can they not say that no claim, title-papers, or deeds, under the act of 1795, shall be adduced in the courts of the United States, as well as to say that they shall only be adduced under certain prescribed forms?

Upon the whole, it appears to me most evident, on referring to the acts of Georgia, the articles of cession, and the laws of Congress, that the claims under the acts of Georgia have no validity. If, therefore, we give anything, it must be from compassion, and not from the obligations of justice. Let the House, ere it do this, reflect whether there are not objects in the country equally worthy of their compassion. Let them visit the straw shed of the war worn soldier who bled in the defence of our rights; the comfortless hut of the widow who lost her husband in battle. With but little search we shall find a mountain of claims that overhangs the justice of the country. If, after this view, we shall consider any unfortunate victims of injustice in this transaction entitled to compassion, I will agree to go as far as any man in affording them relief. But were we as rich as Cræsus, I would first administer relief to the Belisariuses of our country. Let us be just to these before we are generous to other descriptions of claimants.

In discussing the subject in this manner, said Mr. R., I have attested my entire correspondence with the sentiments of my friend from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) who has so ably advocated these resolutions. I believe that he has irrefragably substantiated the principles and facts they contain. I believe he has placed them on a solid basis, and has erected a pyramid of argument in their support which nothing can shake, and which terminates in a point that must lead to the rejection of the bill. I express this opinion with due deference to the ideas of gentlemen on the other side of the question; only observing, in language used on another occasion, that those who are disposed to censure me for my warmth will give me credit for my sincerity. Thinking as I do, I could not repress it. It was the first lesson of my youth to go where duty led; hitherto I have pursued that course. I have found it the road to conquest, and shall teach it to my children. Had I not, on this occasion, trodden this path, I should have considered myself unworthy of the confidence of those who have sent me here.

Mr. T. M. RANDOLPH.—Mr. Speaker: I hope the House will not consent to postpone these resolutions. I hope it will, on the contrary, immediately proceed to consider them, and conclude by adopting them, for, taken generally, they meet my warm approbation as to the principles they lay down, and I am, anxious to see the last one, which is the fair corollary of the other, incorporated into the bill now before us.

It is with reluctance I trouble the House this session, after so long forbearance, with my opinions and sentiments not yet sufficiently matured by any experience in legislation; but my opinion on this question is so decided, my sentiments at this moment are so strong, and I know them to be so consonant to those relative to this subject which are most prevalent in that district of Virginia I have the honor to represent, that my inclination and my duty combined, impel me irresistibly to make an attempt to communicate them. Besides, when an opinion must be publicly pronounced, as mine must be in giving my vote on this question, and it appears to be obnoxious, perhaps I might say unsafe, to assign, in bold and apt words, the reasons which give rise to it, then, in my mind, it is not manly to retain or to veil those reasons. When hatred, it may be dangerous is likely to ensue from the declaration of truth, then, above all times, I deem it my duty to utter it; for, when many decline that necessary service, none of those who are willing to undertake it can be spared. I have little hope of performing this task in an impressive and agreeable, or even in a smooth manner, but I shall perform it. To do what I conceive to be my duty is my business; the peculiar manner in which I do it is the necessary result of that manner in which nature has formerly done her duty towards me.

My opinion is, that it will cast a broad stain on the American character, as it must be exhibited in future history, for this body which represents it to grant compensation for their pretended losses, under whatever form ingenuity may invent to disguise it, to any of those adventurers who made the spurious contract with Georgia in the year 1795, for the purchase of her western territory, upon the ground that the fictitious bargain gave the least shadow of title to any part of that territory. This opinion is a conviction irresistibly given, to my mind, by an impartial investigation, that what were at that time called companies of land adventurers, were, with the exception of one or two misled individuals, whose delusion and consequent implication I lament, no other, in their conduct on this occasion, than shameless bands of sharpers; what was impudently called a contract, was, in reality, a fraud of unprecedented enormity, and what has since been declared an unjust interposition of the primary sovereign authority of the State, to cancel a fair bargain, was no more than the regular and proper application of the only sufficient means which could be used to redress a cheat upon the people of Georgia of unparalleled audacity and magnitude. I am sorry, by entertaining this opinion, to differ with so many on this floor, with whom it is my pride to think; but I am not much surprised at that difference. Very rarely, indeed, have I heard of important questions which did not divide opinions; never have I been at a criminal trial where numbers did not doubt the reality of the crime. Such is the difference in the impression made by the same testimony upon different minds. Were it not for this extraordinary circumstance in our nature, which almost precludes unanimity, and which completely defies explanation upon any general principles of the moral structure of man, there would be but one sentiment in this House upon the question now before it. The information which has satisfied my mind, I have derived from the declarations of the counties of Georgia, in their petitions and remonstrances presented to the convention of that State, which assembled in the month of May, 1795; from the acknowledgment made by that convention of the dignity of those applications, and the respect due to them, in the resolve which referred the matter they contained to the consideration of the succeeding Legislature; from the proceedings of the General Assembly of 1796, upon that matter, and the evidence it collected and recorded relative thereto; and, lastly, from certain declarations and provisions confirming those proceedings, and thereby establishing that evidence, which were made by the convention of 1798, and which exist now in the body of the present constitution of Georgia. The same means of information are within the reach of all; I ought to say, should be possessed by all; I might say, should be satisfactory to all; since the witnesses are the great body of the people of one of our respectable States, and the testimony is authenticated, confirmed, and preserved, as well by the constitutional as the ordinary code of that State.

It has not been my object in making this inquiry, to learn in what deep sharper's brain this scheme was first engendered, which of the associates stood most prominent in the development and execution of it, how the price paid for the flagrant treason against posterity was apportioned, or how the spoil obtained by such a stupendous larceny, committed upon the inheritance of the unborn, was divided. I have not desired to know, and it would be unimportant to the House to be informed, which of the associates had no moral sense at all, whose conscience was subdued by his avarice, or who, unthinkingly, gave the control of it into the hands of his friend. I desire not to see any name consigned to infamy; of those which have come to my knowledge, one or two I yet respect; the remainder have not more distinct images annexed to them, in my mind, than those of the men who conceived and executed the South Sea cheat in England, or the Mississippi fraud in France. But, from the investigation I have made, I have learned, as certainly as the actions of men can be known to others than the actual beholders of them, that the Legislature of Georgia, which commenced its session in the autumn of 1794, was assailed by every possible artifice of seduction, to procure from it the act of 7th January, 1795, which constituted what has since been impudently called the Yazoo contract. That it yielded to those artifices, and a considerable majority of its members became treacherous to their constituents, and deaf to the voice of their honor. That bribes were daringly offered and unblushingly received for votes in favor of the land. That the property of the State of Georgia, to the amount of forty millions of dollars, at the most reasonable estimate, was sold by those trustees of the people of Georgia for one half million, and purchased by the sellers themselves, in combination with certain abject worshippers of gold, who had artfully infused into them their blind fanaticism. That another offer of four-fifths of a million, made by other men at the same time, was rejected, because the Legislature itself was concerned in the first. That the Chief Magistrate of the State, after one feeble effort of resistance, and a declaration which ought to have bound him to an obstinate opposition, with a conduct which, to my mind, manifests a thorough knowledge of the corrupt views of the Legislature, as well as a want of energy to defeat them, yielded to the impulse, and ratified the fraudulent sale. That the moment his irresolute hand gave the illusive sanction to the vain and ineffectual deed, this ravenous pack of speculators, keen with the hunger of avarice, unkennelled and scoured the whole peopled territory of the Union in quest of their appropriate game—the simple, the credulous, and those who are hoodwinked by the excess of their own cupidity. The most voracious of them sought the great cities, where numbers of the thirsty sons of gain became their prey, while numbers more joined in the promising chase, led the way to the victims, and fattened on their spoil. Many, more fell in their nature, though less keen in their appetites for gold, traversed the tranquil country of New England, scenting the homely purses which hung in the smoky corner of peaceful cottages, into which the solitary dollar had been dropped with religious punctuality every week, perhaps every month only, by the hand of the provident father, from the time when the first birth under his roof gladdened his heart. Great numbers of these receptacles of hard-earned gain, with all their rusty treasure, the fruit of long continued industry and frugality, destined to insure to many of the rising race the innocent joys of a life of wholesome exertion in their own fields, were devoured by them, and that happy destiny in a moment changed for a short period of certain pain, and, too probable, vice, in the moving prisons of the ocean.

The promulgation of the law produced one general murmur of indignation throughout the State of Georgia. The crime committed by the representatives of the people was strongly denounced by the grand juries of all the succeeding courts. An assembly of special representatives, which had been summoned for constitutional purposes, meeting in the succeeding spring, was addressed by all the counties of the State, and by nearly the whole people of it, with memorials, remonstrances, and petitions, according to the different degrees of excitement, all setting forth in strong terms the nefarious act, complaining with bitterness of the perfidy of the Legislature, requiring, urging, and imploring the convention to proclaim the fact, and annul the fraudulent sale. No laborious investigation into the huge and naked scheme of speculation, no troublesome search after testimony to expose the framer of it was necessary. Nothing was requisite but to receive, condense, and record the decisive evidence voluntarily offered from all quarters. But this legitimate and easy task the convention, naturally enough, thought fit to decline, as many of its members were themselves openly* concerned, and many more secretly interested in the purchase. The pack of speculators were then in full cry, the game were falling abundantly into their jaws; it could scarcely be expected that those who had contributed so much to set this chase on foot, who expected to share so largely in its profits, should sound the horn of alarm to the objects of it. It quickly occurred to a majority of this body, that a reference of these addresses to the Legislature of the next year, would not only give time for the continuance of the chase, but might be productive of something like safety in the after possession of the spoils of it; while it promised to afford some shield against the popular discontent and indignation which a total neglect, so desirable to themselves, must inevitably have brought on them. Notwithstanding, before midsummer of the same year, the fraudulency and consequent invalidity of the sale must have been unequivocally known throughout the Union, by the ferment in the State of Georgia. Early in the succeeding year all the records of State relative to this transaction were burned, and all recorded evidences of private contracts which had arisen out of the land were cancelled, destroyed, and forbidden to be renewed or afterwards admitted in the courts by the Legislature acting under the authority to consider the matter, and of course the power to redress the complaint of the petitions, which had been given to it by the convention, and also under the express injunction of the people themselves, laid on the individual members of that body at the elections. But the speed of the sharpers had outstripped the slow step of the State. They had, in a great measure, executed their swindling scheme; a number of their dupes were already, instead of amusing their own credulity, insincerely, and I will say, insolently, accusing the perfidy of Georgia.

That was a blot made which never can be completely expunged from the page of American history. It is local, however, and as yet stains but one small spot of that fair sheet. And shall this body, the genuine representative of the American nation, influenced by the clamor of sharpers and the complaints of their dupes, by admitting the bill now pending before it, by refusing these counteracting resolutions proposed to it, extend it over the whole?

I trust we will not. I feel confident we shall, by adopting the one, and rejecting the other, diminish the disgusting spot, so that it shall scarcely be offensive to the eye of the reader of distant futurity. If we do not, it must appear to that eye deeper than any stain of venality in the annals of that nation which affects to believe that corruption is politically wholesome; blacker than any blot ever thrown upon that page by the unnatural alliance of Christian avarice with Mahometan cruelty against that devoted country, for the oppression and ruin of which all the vices of the cross and the crimes of the crescent seem to have combined; insomuch as we declare public and private morals to be the only pillar which can support our system, while they openly avow the desire of gain to be the most valuable spring of human actions. Let us not show to-day that our belief is feigned. Let us demonstrate it to be serious. Let us go further, and display the same tenderness for the future character of the American nation, of our time, which we individually feel for that private fame we are respectively to leave with our fellow-citizens hereafter. We may afterwards yield to the impulse of charitable feelings, and relieve, by moderate grants of land, and land only, I hope, all those sufferers who are entirely innocent of this crime, and sincerely ignorant of its perpetration. That innocence and ignorance, or the contrary, guilt and acquaintance with the fraud, can be collected with considerable certainty by an attention to the times and places in the written evidences of the pretended claims, as they must display the information relative to the nature of the transaction which might and ought to have been possessed by the purchasers. Some atonement is due from the State of Georgia for the perfidy of so many of her exalted citizens. She has acknowledged that it is due: she has provided for making it, by placing five millions of acres of land in our hands as a fund for that and certain lesser purposes. The task of applying that fund we have willingly assumed. Is it possible we can coolly resolve, in performing the voluntary service, to insult, most grossly to insult, that respectable State by granting any part of that fund to men whom it has stigmatized, whose conduct in this affair it has in its primary sovereign capacity solemnly pronounced infamous, and whom its representatives on this floor continue still, by the part they take in this question, bitterly to denounce? Surely it is not possible we can give this insult to the State of Georgia. We know she must have intended, if not that an exact discrimination should be made, at least, that a complete exclusion of all the parties to the original fraud, and all the propagators of the mischief of it, should be effected. For myself, I believe the former was the intention, as I know it now to be the wish of Georgia. What will the people of that State think of our conduct if we act otherwise? What should we think of trustees who should render inaccurate expressions in an instrument of trust; bestow upon the highwaymen or incendiaries themselves the best part of a donation, placed in their hands by charitable persons, for the relief of sufferers by highway robbery or by wilful burning? I trust we shall apply this fund for the relief of the real sufferers. I know that it is greatly more than sufficient for that purpose, and I hope the United States will not be forced by Congress to assume a heavy debt for the increase of it, in order that it may be extended further than charity or justice requires, to objects on which benevolence could not look, and at which justice shakes her head. I trust we will revive the hopes of those good parents of whom I have spoken, and we will restore the destiny of their injured children, but I cannot believe we will consent to admit to a share of the bounty of Georgia, along with them, the wicked contrivers of their distress. Those eagles in human shape, although they were driven with disgrace from the gigantic prey at which they had audaciously stooped, have borne afar immense booty in their rapacious talons. I am assured that somewhat more than a million* of dollars has been truly amassed by them, all from the fraudulent sale; and that of the half million which was paid to Georgia for a property worth then forty millions, and rapidly rising in value, till checked by a late occurrence, five-sixth parts has been withdrawn by them, with her permission, from her treasury, where it lay despised and untouched as polluted trash. Not yet glutted, they now threaten, insolently threaten, to return to the rescued prey, and under assumed, for ought I know innocent names, boldly solicit ten millions from the nation as the price of their abandonment of it. Nay, they have become so fastidious at length, that they now disdain any portion of the destined prey itself. † They require their indemnity for its having been forced out of their talons in American stock. Yazoo stock! Ten millions of Yazoo stock! Heaven preserve our ears from this frightful sound. That of Algerine tribute has always been so distressing to mine, that I have often wished the nation would risk some of its blood to purchase the eternal suppression of it. When once they become subject to be assailed in passing the walls of our treasury by the hideous note of Yazoo stock, from that moment they must become forever callous to all tones which convey the infamy of my country. What excuse can we make to the nation for not carefully excluding them from the additional emolument by their iniquity, which they now boldly expect? Can we say there are no discriminating powers at our command, by which we can separate the real sufferers by their fraud, from the contrivers of it, and the selfish propagators of its mischief? Surely we cannot. The original lists of the four companies, including all the associates, certainly cannot be so carefully hidden as to elude all search. Surely an attention to the proximity or distance of the residence of those claimants who were afterwards involved from the scene of the iniquitous act, and a notice of the period when that iniquity became notorious, will enable any tribunal to distinguish the innocent and ignorant purchaser from the fraudulent and knowing speculator, with some degree of accuracy, if not with a precision sufficient completely to satisfy justice. Are we compelled, by our agreement with Georgia, to throw down what her humanity has put into our hands for the relief of the innocent sufferers, (and surely we will not insult her by presuming she meant to include the guilty,) that it may be scrambled for by all the claimants, and seized in the proportions which antecedent cunning and swindling dexterity may have destined? We cannot say we are. Yet what else shall we be doing, if we pass this bill, and thereby confine our commissioners to the literal proofs of those false though specious claims—if we neglect to give them the power, if we fail to instruct them, I ought to say carefully to sift out of the claims all evidence of the original fraud, or of a probable acquaintance with it, which they may contain, and reject or admit them by that test. Ought we not to expect that all the disinterested in the nation will be struck with astonishment if, while some of us are proclaiming the odious origin of these claims, a majority, without disproving our assertions, should pronounce them all to have some legal foundation, and proceed to give indiscriminate relief to the holders of them? For myself, I must hear much more than I have yet heard in support of that opinion, to remove my amazement at it. Surely there cannot be so wide a difference between law and justice, that the former can embrace what the latter must loathe. I have heretofore thought, notwithstanding the simple, uniform, and universally manifest character of the one, and the complicated, various, occult nature of the other, that their essence was the same. I have always believed and till now thought all men concurred with me in the belief, that whatever was manifestly fraudulent must be illegal; that no lapse of time, no change of circumstances, no complication of numbers or of influence, could legalize it. I have further believed that no act of any Legislature, manifestly immoral and unjust, could be deemed genuine, and be afterwards calmly received as binding on the State. These points of belief I shall ever retain, and were my tenderness less for the gentlemen who differ with me on this question, I should not hesitate, trusting yet to their concurrence, to conclude now by calling on them to disprove the history we have given of those claims, or to withdraw their favor from the claimants, to consent to the consideration of those resolutions, and ultimately to the rejection of the bill before us.

But my deference for the sentiments of those gentlemen, leads me for a moment to abandon these all-important axioms of social and political morality, which I have just stated, and which they seem to disallow by advocating the claims; for a moment to admit that a Legislature may, in some way, derive from a constitution the power to do acts manifestly immoral, unjust, and treacherous; that corruption may be purified, fraud may be sanctioned, robbery may be made to give a valid title, by Legislative authority. They will, I make no doubt, with equal complaisance, permit me to demand some admissions of the same nature from them. A government can then, by construction or inference, derive from a constitution the power of plundering the State, and may legitimate the act, so that individuals, into whose hands the plunder may fall, shall be able afterwards to defend their possession of it in courts of justice. Because no literal prohibitory declaration exists in the Constitution of the United States, any more than in the former constitution of Georgia, to guard against what honesty could never have foreseen; their Government, too, may legitimately transfer, for a trivial consideration, to its own members, or to favored individuals, for their private emolument, the best property of the nation, to any amount. Congress can now constitutionally pass a law to divide the contents of the Treasury among the individual members, for imaginary or trivial services, after stipulating a participation; because it has the power to give compensation to those who may render real services to the nation. Nay, because the Senators and Representatives may, by their own vote, take a compensation for their services from the Treasury; they might, also, applying a loose construction to the term compensation, divide the contents of the Treasury amongst themselves, to indemnify them for the long privation of domestic happiness they are here compelled to undergo; and they would be liable to nothing more, therefore, than the neglect and contempt of their constituents.

These positions admitted, I could not refuse to grant, that the Legislature of Georgia, of 1795, could have legitimately sold to companies composed of their own members and others, for a price less than the annual quit-rent the same lands would have paid formerly to the Crown of Great Britain, forty millions of acres of the finest lands in the world, belonging to that State. But in granting it, I should deem it my duty immediately to move this House to take into consideration, with all speed, the necessity of increasing the list of prohibitory clauses in the Federal Constitution. I would recommend, along with numbers of others which would be as necessary, the following: The Senators and Representatives shall not plunder the Treasury under pretext of requiring themselves for their services; the members of the Government shall not engross to themselves the national possessions. Certainly, if it is maintained that a subsequent Legislature can have no power of punishment or of resumption where the plain letter has not been disregarded, such prohibitions as these, ought, without delay, to be adopted into the Federal Constitution. If otherwise, then is the Yazoo tenure ridiculous indeed, for by that doctrine alone, could it be supported.

My respect for our opponents in this question, still prevents my concluding here. I will endeavor to show them that that tenure was contradictory not only to the general laws of equity, but also to the then existing constitution of Georgia, and, accordingly, absolutely null. I have always understood that in equity, a bargain, (above all, for land,) though quite clear of any other symptom of fraud, could not be valid unless it included a valuable consideration. That the circumstance of the consideration being so ridiculously trivial, as to what was agreed to be accepted by the Legislature of Georgia, would be sufficient to cancel any bargain for land between individuals, even after it came into the hands of a subsequent purchaser, if he had made his purchase after open denial of the contract, and public reclamation by the original owner. This was not only a rule of equity in Georgia, but a principle recognised by a positive law of that State. (See Marburie's Digest of the Laws of Georgia, page 116.)

The price agreed to be paid to Georgia was one cent, and one-fourth of another cent, per acre. The lands sold were, in a great part, among the most fertile of the earth, situated in one of its finest climates, and adapted to all its richest productions. They were sold too, not to citizens of the State alone, and men with agricultural views, but in a great measure to strangers, and altogether to speculators, who meant to demand some hundreds of cents from the sub-purchaser with cultivating intentions. This immense difference would soon have disappeared, swallowed up in luxuries; perhaps the farmer would have been ejected from his farms because his toil did not produce fast enough for impatient appetite. The people of Georgia, the true owners of these lands, immediately reclaimed them, as I have shown, in the most public manner; and among other stronger reasons, upon the ground of the insignificance of the consideration stipulated for by their trustees; and they instructed their next representatives to resume them. These representatives did so; and their act of doing so was solemnly ratified by a Convention.

But many gentlemen here contend, notwithstanding, that the law was irrepealable, and that the contract made by it, however irreciprocal, was valid and indefeasible. I shall make no other reply to them than to endeavor to expose still farther the illegal foundation of that contract. Taking my eyes for a moment from the fraudulent nature of it, I will endeavor to look seriously into the Constitutional character of the pretended law which established it—I will examine more nearly the ground upon which it was framed. I trust I shall be able to show that it stood on a basis of perjured misconstruction, which the first honest breath blown against it completely overturned. It is not requisite to show that the Legislature of Georgia, which convened in December, 1794, had no powers but such as were directly, or through honest inference, granted to it by the convention of 1789. The members of that Legislature themselves claimed no others. It is not necessary, either, for us to search throughout that instrument for a special grant of power to support the law of January 7, 1795. The members themselves selected the head which they pretended to believe contained that grant. Let us examine it: "The General Assembly shall have power to make all laws and ordinances which they shall deem necessary and proper for the good of the State, which shall not be repugnant to this constitution." Under such a narrow and flimsy cloak did they expect to hide this gigantic fraud. But this was the peculiar folly of those times. Under such another did certain political assassins, not long after, attempt to strangle unseen the infant liberty of America.

The very next section of the constitution says, "the General Assembly shall have power to alter the boundaries of counties, and to lay off new ones out of them, as well as out of the other vacant territory belonging to the State;" again—"and when any new county shall be laid off in the vacant territory of the State, such county shall have a number of representatives," &c. How could it be other than repugnant to the Constitution to render entirely nugatory this important provision of it? Does not the constitution plainly enough prescribe a division into counties before a sale, by this provision, for a representation in that case, and by totally neglecting to make any kind of provision for the case of sale before a division? Is it possible the framers of the constitution could have foreseen, imagined, or deemed possible, the case which actually happened, and, at the same time, have used the language they did? If the term county was understood to imply representation of course, and the constitutional power to divide after the sale, why was so particular provision made for representation in those counties to be formed out of the waste and unappropriated lands? A power is expressly given to lay off counties within other counties, or in the vacant and unappropriated lands of the State, with a view that representation should coextend with population. The territory after the sale was neither; of course no power remained to divide it into counties, but that power being expressly given, none could have been given to defeat it: yet that was completely done by the law on which these claims rest. One preceding Legislature had laid off the county of Bourbon on the Mississippi—no doubt supposing that to be the true meaning of the constitution which we have given—and had actually proceeded to make grants or sales of land within it. Another had rejected an application to purchase the territory in conformity with the report of its committee, consisting of one member from each county in the State, which report, it is likely, was founded upon the construction we maintain. One, it is true, had acted otherwise; but the eagerness with which the succeeding one seized an occasion that presented itself for retracing the steps of the former, is an additional proof that what we contended for was the sentiment of the State. But the Legislature of 1795, actuated by the motives I have displayed—its prime movers, perhaps, instigated by certain juggling politicians from the North, who preferred to attain the justly desired end of separating that territory from the State, and thereby diminishing the dangerous size of Georgia, by intrigue rather than the plain means since adopted—the Legislature of 1795, I say, in contempt of the general sentiment of the State, in open violation of the constitution, made one sweeping sale of the whole territory for a contemptible price. Nay, with the words of their oath—"I solemnly swear I will give my vote on all questions as in my judgment will best promote the good of the State"—with these words yet vibrating on their tongues, they rejected four-fifths of a million offered at the the same time, on the same terms of payment, and, to promote the good of the State according to their peculiar judgment of it, we must suppose, took one half million. But perhaps they knew that those who offered the $800,000 were not as sure paymasters as themselves; or perhaps they thought the honorable body of notables of Georgia, which, although numbers of it expressed a noble disdain and indignation at the transaction, was yet fully represented in the companies; or perhaps they thought that was the true thing meant by the term State, in the constitution. Such an hypothesis was not unfashionable in those days, above all in what were supposed the most enlightened parts of the Union.

I might have been abruptly stopped by an observation that we had no right to consider the constitutionality of the laws of Georgia, any more than the morality of her lawgivers; but a shield, which has blunted so many darts that the stoutest of our foes of the present day seem fonder of making feints than hurling seriously at it, stands interposed between me and that attack. I have only to repeat, that, in considering the question before us, we must pronounce between the law of 1785 and that of 1796; that to execute the trust we have undertaken for Georgia, we must decide upon her discordant legislation. I will go on with considering further the constitutionality of the law of 1795. Those particular arrangements which we have shown were made by the Georgia constitution of 1789 for the incorporation of the western territory into the State, surely ought to have extinguished, even in the womb of infancy, all embryo construction for alienating the territory from the jurisdiction of the State; and the law of 1785 did most completely alienate the jurisdictional right of Georgia, along with the soil. The territory, after the grant, could not have been divided into counties; its inhabitants, by an express provision of the grant, could not be taxed by the ordinary Legislature until represented, nor could they have been represented in it under the then existing constitution, until divided into counties. The provisions of the constitution for the incorporation of the territory could not have applied after the grant, for they were expressly made for vacant and unappropriated lands. The jurisdiction of the territory was then lost to Georgia, and of course transferred, though informally, yet substantially, and no doubt designedly, to the United States. Designedly, I make no doubt, for by this renunciation of State jurisdiction, thus artfully interwoven into the contract, the value of the lands was so plainly enhanced. Purchasers from abroad and from the other States would have come forward in great numbers and with much greater alacrity, knowing privately that the territory would come immediately under the Federal jurisdiction, and be sooner erected into new States. Who can believe that the associates and those who held under them, once settled in their territory, and this hidden grapple I have endeavored to discover, once thrown out by them upon the Federal Government, the strength of Georgia ever could have broken it? But until the constitution of 1798, no power ever existed in Georgia, unless in the whole body of the people collectively, to make an alienation of the territory of that State. Authority for that since made to the United States was given by the convention of 1798, and such a power, it seems to me, can properly flow only from that prime source in any of the States.

That there is a necessary and inherent power even in our national Government to alienate and acquire territory at will, I am not ready to admit. It cannot be necessary where a recurrence to the primary authority is so frequently, so easily, and so safely made as with us. To say it is an inherent power in all governments, from the nature of government, even though not absolutely necessary, would be looking abroad again for analogies, and so far relinquishing our own peculiar and excellent theory. Having purified so well the turbid waters we drew from the political fountains of Europe, better to cut off all communication with their impure sources, than again to admit from them any little rill which might once more discolor our now almost transparent stream. I can never admit a right in any Government which is founded upon the sovereignty of the people, whose sole legitimate end is their good, to grant monopolies of the unappropriated soil. No possible restrictions can, in my opinion, prevent such monopolies from operating powerfully against that good and against the essential principles of such Governments. Besides, many individuals among the people have, according to my idea, just claims upon the nation for free grants of such lands. Poor men, who have lost their limbs or their health in defence of their country, even though they may have received a pittance of daily pay; poor persons upon whom nature has bestowed an uncommonly numerous offspring; poor and virtuous citizens who have married early in life, and having the prospect of a family to maintain sooner than the savings of labor could accumulate sufficiently to insure that maintenance against accidents to the parent, which might suspend the power of labor. All these, I contend, have the right, and it is at least as well-founded as that of not famishing for sustenance, from society.

There are certain conditions, it is true, not improper to notice here, though not altogether pertinent, upon which alone this right should be acknowledged on the part of Government. These are, an actual settlement of the lands immediately, an abandonment of the rights of alienation during the first lives, an equal division among successors. This right is necessarily admitted by the calls for new establishments of those who are able to purchase, which arise continually from the increase of numbers, and of agricultural capital. By answering such at a just price, the national strength, which consists in the number of proprietors, is equally increased as by gifts, and at the same time the national resources are enlarged in the most desirable way—the voluntary contributions of the able. The liberty of a nation it is true, like that of the rich individual, should always keep in view the ratio of necessary expense, to the amount of the certain and natural resources. It should be more ready, yet at the same time not less prudent and discerning. But by monopolies of the soil, this right of certain citizens, which I have mentioned, is destroyed; liberality itself is extinguished; the national resources are sacrificed for the pernicious aggrandizement of those already too high, to the still greater debasement of those already too low. Innumerable are the evils arising out of them, which appear at once to the examiner's eye, and demonstrate that the power to grant them cannot constitutionally exist in any of our Governments, unless especially delegated.

If this view I have endeavored to lay open to the grant from Georgia, which is the basis of these claims, be fairly taken, no one, I think, can seriously apprehend the legal ejectionment from their possessions, of those who may make purchases or receive donations from the United States in the territory pretended to be claimed by the Yazoo adventurers. I cannot believe myself that they will ever venture into the courts of justice of the Union with their fictitious title paper in their hands; in every line of which the word fraud will appear at once in large and indelible characters. If they should, contrary to my expectation, be daring enough, I cannot think so injuriously of any judge of the Union, as to apprehend, that, maintaining the power which sold to be legitimate, shutting his eyes upon the unexampled perfdy of the sellers, denying the early publicity of the fraudulent nature of the transaction, rejecting the authority of the subsequent Legislature to resume the property upon evidence of these, and also the paramount authority of the convention to annul the law, which was acknowledged by the adventurers themselves in withdrawing their money; last of all, declaring the consideration paid by the original purchasers to be sufficiently valuable; he will pronounce the law of Georgia, of 7th January, 1795, to be binding and to preclude equity from the State. Not every judge on the bench of the Union will, I firmly believe, at once declare this law null, all contracts made under it void, and all considerations given upon them reclaimable. If I thought otherwise I would readily acquiesce in any, however strong, remediable measures. I would vote for a law forbidding the admission of such evidence into our courts. If nothing else would do, I would even give my voice in this House for imposing a heavy penalty on the man who should dare to assert such a detestable claim to the indisputable property of the nation, and thereby disparage the property. Our opponents say, the danger of being dragged into courts of justice at any distant day, however uncertain the apprehension of that anxiety, which the most distant prospect of being dispossessed in our old age of buildings, orchards, gardens, established by our own hands, must naturally create in men, will keep all purchasers aloof, will effectually prevent all sales, and keep our most important and most exposed frontier forever weak and defenceless. I answer, let those lands then remain unsold: the nation will sustain no damage in its interest thereby, for it has more at market elsewhere than the demand is likely to take for a great length of time. It is even my opinion that interest will be materially forwarded by the suspension of sales there at this time. It is not, I say, a weak and defenceless frontier, which it is so necessary to strengthen immediately with new settlers that the attainment of that end could justify our giving a bounty to fraud. The most vulnerable point of the Union is now removed many hundred miles farther from the centre, and every settlement made elsewhere at present contributes to diminish our means of covering that point with the impenetrable armour of a republican militia.

Shall we permit those motives of policy to govern us in this happy time of assured peace, unexampled prosperity, and rare tranquillity and unanimity, which we should always reject with disdain if it were not that, if not the stratagems and deceptions, at least the forbearances towards fraud, vice, and crime, often necessary in actual war, are thought in some degree justifiable also in certain other periods of national danger, embarrassment or difficulty? For myself I never could have lent my voice in this House to support that policy, even when such reasons had their strongest force. Much less can I acquiesce now. I cannot consent that this Government should draw a veil over its eyes to admit the approaches of fraud. I cannot give my consent that it should tamely suffer itself to be bullied out of such a serious portion of the national wealth, as $2,500,000, which a former act of these Houses has led our commissioners to offer in order to quiet these unfounded claims. I have yet the strongest hopes we shall dismiss them unsatisfied by rejecting this bill. Surely we will not, by passing it, enable with Legislative favor the mysteries of speculation: we will not hold out to the tribe of speculators an expectation that this Government will in future gratuitously underwrite on all their land adventures, if they will be moderate in their insurance. Our bounty to the innocent sufferers will do no trifling mischief, by removing from credulity its only restraint, timidity and doubt, which otherwise must have been greatly fortified by this distressing example. I hope, however, we shall extend that bounty to them. But upon the adventurers themselves, or on those who knowingly embarked with them in this desperate and infamous scheme, the nation's forgiveness and its silence is the only boon I will ever give my voice to bestow. We shall, I ardently hope, grant them no other here. If they reflect I think they will accept that and retire; let them do so, and in retiring, let them silently return thanks to the great Creator of all things for his bounty to man in granting him through this life a free will, uninterrupted, unrestrained by heavenly interference. But for this bounty, the wrath of Heaven would have arrested them in the commencement of their scheme. They have made that use they thought best of Heaven's favor; they have coolly projected and pursued their own chosen plan for advancement in life; let them not look to this Government for aid to bear them up under the disappointment of its failure. But a few days since, their hopes were high: they expected immediately to attain by our supineness the end of their forcibly moderated desires. Thank Heaven, by the bold use of its most noble gift, which was then made by one gentleman particularly in this House, they were suddenly stopped in their progress, and that hope, unless they are thoroughly blinded by their own ardor, completely extinguished. They escaped the thunder of Heaven, but they have not the certain earthly punishment. Since that day they have stood in the eyes of an indignant nation, riven, blasted, stripped of all the lovely foliage of reputation by the lightning of eloquence.

Mr. LYON.—Although, sir, I have no wish to assume the character of the cunning and sagacious fox of the temperate zone, I am willing to be allowed to possess a share of the magnanimity of the animal whose name has accidentally fallen to my lot, with which magnanimity I will meet the resolutions of the gentleman from Virginia. Certain I am that I come forward on this occasion with clean hands and a pure heart, wishing for a discussion of this subject on the broadest basis. I wish to let my constituents and all the world know the principles that govern me; I am willing to publish my creed on all questions of civil policy involved in this or any other subject that shall come before this House.

The gentleman from Virginia has brought forward certain resolutions, which have been published, and have been called the articles of the creed of the democrats. I am a democrat, and am very free to declare that they are not the articles of my faith. Those articles, in their present shape, contain what I call political heresy; and, rather than be obliged to swallow them, I would be willing to risk the imputation of schism; and should it take place in the democratic church, I am willing to leave the democratic republicans of America to judge who has been the cause of this schism—he who attempts to force his unequalled creed on the public and on Congress, or he who offers amendments, and cannot swallow it in its present crude state.

A few days since I mentioned my intention of introducing, in the course of the discussion of this subject, some amendments, which, with others that on deliberation I think necessary, I will now read, in order to declare my intention of getting them incorporated with the original resolutions. [Here Mr. L. read twenty-one amendments with the original resolutions of Mr. RANDOLPH, as they would read when such amendments were incorporated, as follows:—*]

* The parts in italie, with several omissions and alterations of words, are Mr. LYON's amendments.

1. Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Georgia were at no time invested with the power of alienating the right of soil possessed by the good people of that State in and to the vacant territory of the same but in a rightful manner, and for the public good,

These resolutions, thus amended, said Mr. L., I am willing should be considered as the articles of my faith, so far as they go; but as other gentlemen have taken the liberty to depart from the question of postponement, and enter into the merits of the whole subject before the House, I hope I shall be indulged in now submitting the observations I had contemplated to have delivered on the bill when regularly under consideration.

Among the various subjects which have called for the attention of this House the present session, I believe no one has caused so much irritation as the present, and in no one have I been more mortified to be obliged to give my vote and opinion contrary to that of many gentlemen of this House with whom I have been in the habit of thinking of which such Legislatures are the Constitutional judges.

2. That when the Governors of any people shall have betrayed the confidence reposed in them, and shall have exercised that authority with which they have been clothed for the general welfare, to promote their own private ends, under the basest motives, and to the public detriment, it is the inalienable right of a people so circumstanced to revoke the authority thus abused; to resume the rights thus attempted to be bartered, and to abrogate the act thus endeavoring to betray them: provided that the public faith and the confidence necessary to be placed by men in each other, and the confidence necessary between the Government and individuals, be not impaired.

3. That it is in evidence to this House, by ex parte depositions, that the act of the Legislature of Georgia, passed on the seventh of January, 1795, entitled "An act for appropriating a part of the unlocated territory of this State for the payment of the late State troops, and for other purposes," was passed by persons under the influence of gross and palpable corruption, practised by the grantees of the lands attempted to be alienated by the aforesaid act, tending to enrich and aggrandize, to a degree almost incalculable, a few individuals, and ruinous to the public interest: but whether it is so or not this House is by no means competent to decide, nor does it possess the means of forming a just and impartial decision upon the subject.

4. That the good people of Georgia, impressed with general indignation at this act of supposed atrocious perfidy and unparalleled corruption, with a promptitude of decision highly honorable to their character, under such impressions, did, by the act of a subsequent Legislature, passed on the thirteenth of February, 1796, under circumstances of peculiar solemnity, and finally sanctioned by the people, who have subsequently ingrafted it upon their constitution, which to this House appears to be strong testimony that the said Legislature had not previously a right so to do, to declare the preceding act, and the grants made under it, in themselves null and void; that the said act should be expunged from the records of the State, and be publicly burnt, which was accordingly done; provision at the same time being made for restoring the pretended purchase-money to the grantees, by whom, or by persons claiming under them, part of the said purchase-money has been withdrawn from the treasury of Georgia.

5. That a subsequent Legislature of an individual State has an undoubted right to repeal any act of a preceding Legislature, provided such repeal be not forbidden by the constitution of such State or of the Unit-and acting. This makes it the more proper for me to detail the reasons which have governed the vote I have given on this occasion, and will govern those it will be necessary for me to give.

In the first place, I will endeavor to take a concise view of the history of this subject as it occurs to me.

The State of Georgia claimed a great country lying between the settled part of that State and the Mississippi; part of this territory was claimed by the United States, and I believe part by South Carolina. Georgia was, with the other States, (having claims of unappropriated territories,) invited to cede those claims to the United States, the acquirement of those countries having been effected by the common exertions of the people of all the States. Georgia had suffered more, and I believe had fought more in the Revolutionary war, according to the number of her whig inhabitants, than any other State; she felt her sufferings; she met with harsh treatment and neglect from the Federal Government in the early part of the Administration, and she was not disposed to relinquish her claim to the Western country. As early as 1789, it seems the Legislature of that State made a bargain to sell a great part of that country to certain companies called the Virginia and South Carolina Yazoo Companies. On account of non-payment, or owing to some other causes, that bargain was not consummated, and the Legislature of Georgia, in or about the year 1795, offered these lands for sale, and did actually, by an act of their Legislature, dated 7th of January, 1795, and by Executive acts founded thereon, sell and convey by deed their claim and title to about forty millions of acres of that territory, for which they received the compensation agreed on. The succeeding Legislature, it seems, did not like the bargain their predecessors had made. They thought they did not get price enough for the land, or they thought if they did, they put too much of the money in their own pockets. Until

ed States; and provided that such act is not a pledge of faith to any individual or body politic or corporate, and does not purport to invest any individual or body politic or corporate with any individual right.

6. That the aforesaid act of the State of Georgia, passed on the thirteenth of February, 1796, was not forbidden by the constitution of that State nor by that of the United States, unless it affected the rights of some individual or body politic or corporate.

7. That the claims of persons derived under the aforesaid act of the seventh of January, 1795, are recognised impliedly by compact between the United States and the State of Georgia, and by an act of the Federal Government, passed at the last session of the 7th Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That the five millions of acres reserved for satisfying and quieting claims to the lands ceded by the State of Georgia to the United States, and appropriated by the act of Congress passed at their last session, shall be appropriated to quiet or compensate any claims derived under any act, or pretended act of the State of Georgia, passed, or alleged to be passed, during the year 1795, after making provision for other claims secured by law.

now, I never heard it contended that the Legislature of 1795 had not as ample power to dispose of the land as any succeeding Legislature would have had, in case it had not been sold. They, after declaring the sale null and void on account of its being effected by fraud, bribery, and corruption, endeavored to erase and destroy every evidence of the transaction. The proceedings of the Legislature of Georgia on this subject in 1796, carry on the very face of them a doubt of their ability to do away the title given in 1795, when they endeavor to perplex the holders of it by the destruction of the records.

By Commissioners on the part of the United States and on the part of Georgia, an agreement had been entered into lately by which all the title and claim remaining to Georgia on that territory has become vested in the United States. But this has not been done without fair warning being given on the part of the purchasers under the act of Georgia of 1795, wherein they state to the President their purchase, and the ground of their claims.

By the act of Congress passed March 3d, 1802, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, were authorized to receive propositions of compromise and settlement from the several companies of persons claiming lands in that territory. This law has been published and has operated as an invitation to those claimants to come forward with their propositions for a compromise of their title; and propositions have been accordingly made which it seems it is in our power to comply with, notwithstanding the severe limitation of Georgia, which does not allow the United States to give more than 5,000,000 of acres of those lands to quiet all the claims. This severe limitation is another strong expression on the part of Georgia of their doubt of the possibility of their doing away, by acts of legislation, the title given by the acts of 1795. I call it a severe limitation, believing as I do that the Legislative and Executive acts of Georgia did, notwithstanding the alleged bribery, legally and authentically convey to the purchasers in 1795, all the title of Georgia to the land so sold; and I do think that the possibility of compromise ought to have been left on a broader basis.

When I saw the convention between the United States and Georgia, I feared by this limitation that every attempt at compromise would prove abortive; that the holders of that title would not accept of what it was in the power of the United States to give, limited as they were in that territory. Thus all my hopes for the speedy settlement of that country were blasted; but I comforted myself before I left home with the thought, by the acquisition of Louisiana, the Government would be able to add (to what Georgia had consented should be given in compromise) a tract on the west of the Mississippi. Feeling as I do a high interest in the settlement of that country lying between me and the ocean, and between my residence and the seats of commerce on the Mississippi, a country which is now, and has long been, a harbor for bands of the most desperate robbers and murderers that ever infested any part of North America—who almost weekly rob or murder some of my neighbors on their return to their homes from market; the settlement of which country I well know must be retarded by the doubt of the title which is offered while two claims exist; or if settled under these disadvantages, it must be settled by people who, not being owners of the soil, will do but little good on it—feeling as I do on the subject, sir, I could not but be extremely pleased to find by the report of the committee to whom this subject has been referred, that a compromise was to be expected without looking to any other resource than the five millions of acres which Georgia had consented should be applied for that purpose.

Georgia Claims.

And nothing could come more unexpectedly to me than the opposition to this compromise, and the arguments made use of to support this opposition.

In the first place, it is urged that the claimants under the act of Georgia of 1795 having obtained their title by means of bribery, it cannot be valid. I fear, Mr. Speaker, that if this principle was to be adopted, very few titles in the United States would bear investigation. I believe it was generally understood, before the Revolution, that there was no approaching the great personage who called the lands we now inhabit his own, for the purpose of obtaining a grant, or even coming at any of his agents in Europe or America for that purpose, through any other medium than the avenues of bribery, by presents and donations, which were to be distributed even among the lowest class of domestics, and I believe very little of the price of the American lands ever went into the Treasury; besides all other presents and donations, there is supposed to be at least 150,000 acres, the best lands in New Hampshire and Vermont, which were reserved by royal Governors directly for themselves, the validity of their title to which I have never heard called in question.

This principle, carried to its extent, would shake the very foundation of the title to landed property in this country; but it has happily never been adopted by any of the courts of the United States. On the contrary, those courts who have the sole power of deciding in cases like this, having the rules, maxims, and precedents before them by which all disputes respecting landed property are to be settled, have decided that the title given by Georgia, in 1795, is a valuable consideration that binds the obligator of a bond given for that title to pay his bond.

Were it now to be established, sir, that the agents who were Constitutionally authorized to grant out the lands of a State, by interesting themselves in the purchase, have rendered invalid the title, deplorable must be the situation of some States in this Union. I remember a grant of land made by a Legislature of a State, in which the name of every member was intended to be inserted as a grantee, and publicly read. I remember many other grants made, in which the members were concerned to what extent they pleased, yet no fault was found. Whenever it was thought that the members acted improperly, they were punished by the neglect of their constituents, but no one thought of invalidating the title.

In the case of the Georgia grant in 1795, I believe it was understood before the members were chosen that it was proposed to sell the western lands; the people ought to have entrusted this important concern with honest men. It is, in my opinion, better to suffer the consequence of almost any act of Government, than admit of the least diminution of public faith. Public faith once pledged by the Constitutional authority, has ever been with me sacred as the sanctum sanctorum itself. In the twenty-five years I have been in legislative business, I have never given a vote which seemed to me so near to infringe on public faith as the votes I have given lately on the subject of the suppression of the Commissioners of Loans; and I gave those votes merely with a view to have the subject brought up in detail, reserving to myself a right of voting against the bill in case the preservation of the public faith should ultimately require it.

One of the most valuable traits in our Government is, that property is secured by known and established rules in the acquirement and transfer of it; and when it is obtained from Government, the Legislature that gave it has no more right to snatch it back again, than individuals have when they give away or sell their property. Suppose another revolution to have taken place in France by this time, and the new Government was to declare to the world, that the First Consul had sold Louisiana to us too cheap, that there was bribery and corruption in the business, and that they would not consider themselves bound by the bargain, and tell us to take our stock again; that they will either keep Louisiana, or sell it to those that will give more for it; would not we think such conduct a most flagrant breach of faith? Would not the world think so? Would not we be ready to declare that we would defend our purchase to the utmost of our power?

I will take the liberty to mention another case which I think is in point. Some years since, the Legislature of Kentucky put their vacant lands on sale for forty dollars an hundred acres, with long credit for the price; since that time, by other successive acts, the price has been reduced and the time of payment lengthened; these measures have been opposed by a considerable minority; should that minority prevail and become a majority at the next session; should they declare (which I believe they might do with truth) that many members of the former majority were interested in the former proceedings of the Legislature; should they declare that the lands were sold too cheap, and too long time given for the payment of the price; should they collect the papers, and by means of a glass draw fire from the sun, or obtain it from another region more favorable to such a design, and make a bonfire of the records and the evidence of the appropriation of the lands heretofore made; should they declare that they had a right to re-sell it, and that they would make a better sale—thirty thousand of as worthy, honest, deserving people as inhabit this continent would be ruined. I think, sir, it is very improbable such a thing will take place; however, the principle urged by gentlemen who sustain the resolution, and oppose the passage of the bill, would justify such a measure.

Although I was not a member of the Congress which established the funding system, I was a spectator, and I believed it to be brought about by corruption and the most iniquitous means. I believe men interested in the speculation influenced the measure. I saw men rising from indigence to opulence by the sub-agency they had in that abominable business. I detested the whole transaction as much as man could, but the public faith being once pledged, I never could consent to a breach of it. I know of no remedy for such evils, but what would encourage a revolutionary spirit, not needed in these days—a spirit which would tend to disorganization, to anarchy and confusion. Let the community suffer for allowing themselves to be imposed on by knaves and they will grow careful whom they trust: such are the reflections we make in private concerns.

I do not believe that this House have power to inquire into the motives of the integrity of the Legislature of Georgia, or any other State; their authority is equal to and independent of that of the Legislature of the United States within their own sphere. I do not believe that any judiciary in this country have that power. If I am not mistaken it has been held by members of this House from one of the greatest States in the Union, that the judiciary of the United States have no right to inquire into the Constitutionality of a law passed by Congress; if this be so (which by the way I don't think to be the case) how can they or we inquire beyond the Constitution itself into the motives of individual members of the Legislature of a sovereign and independent State? Notwithstanding my character has been represented differently, I never was a disorganizer.

So long ago as when we were first about taking up arms in defence of American liberty, I hesitated more to question myself and my acquaintance on the subject of our being able to form and establish a Government suited to our wishes and our wants, than to consider the danger of wounds, death, imprisonment, or any other evil that could happen to me. I have ever dreaded anarchy as the deadliest foe to human happiness. In the early struggles of the country which is now the State of Vermont, military operations became necessary, in order to avoid surrendering our rights and property to a neighboring colony; but I would not join that opposition until a Government of our own was consented to, from which has emanated the Constitution under which four gentlemen hold their seats in this House, and two in the other House of Congress.

At the time when anarchy was prevailing in a State bordering on that in which I lived, the contagion reached Vermont; there are many living witnesses of the energy displayed by me to repress it; myself and my neighbors were ready, and at a moment's warning marched and risked our lives for the Government; from my stores were the militia of the country supplied with provisions, liquor, ammunition, and every necessary; from my pocket were their bills paid. By energy and promptitude Government prevailed; insurrection was nipped in the bud; and we remained quiet, while something like civil war prevailed in our neighboring States for want of that early promptitude and energy.

It is well known to my intimate friends and acquaintance that had I believed opposition to the last Administration had tended to anarchy or disorganization I would have avoided it; as little as I might like a Government administered as ours then was, I would have preferred it, with all that I suffered under it, to anarchy and disorganization. I never shrunk from the claim of a disabled soldier, nor from the honest claim of any public creditor; on this score I have never been behind any member of this House, and I will promise to go every length with the gentlemen from Delaware and Virginia; I think the nation is amply able to pay her debts without plundering or speculating on other people's quarrels. But, sir, it may be said what has all this to do with the present question? I mean by it to show my consistency and my alarm at the revolutionary doctrines held out in the course of the debate on this subject.

It has been said by some gentlemen, who oppose the proposed compromise, that if the title given by Georgia is good for forty millions of acres, why accept it for five? Why not let them have the whole? In answer permit me to say, we are acting for the United States, and we are bound to look to their interest, not that of the claimants; they have judged of what is for their own interest; and if, on account of the difficulties they foresee in contending for their right with the United States, if for peace sake, and perhaps a share of patriotism which induces them to avoid unpleasant controversies with the Government, they are willing to surrender their claim to seven acres for one acre without contention, ought we not to be ready to close a bargain with them? Agents are here, I understand, for the purpose, who are authorized and willing to complete it. After the discussion this subject has had in this House, and a majority of six members have declared themselves in favor of the compromise with a view to favor the United States, not the claimants, and mostly under a conviction that their title is good, can any one suppose that we ever shall have another opportunity to compromise this awfully perplexing business so favorable on the part of the United States as the present? I think not. The claimants, baffled in every attempt at compromise on their part, after being invited to it by the United States, losing all hopes of any kind of compromise, will settle the lands, from which they cannot be driven but by an adjudication of a court of justice, which I believe never can be obtained against them.

Under this impression their price will immediately rise in the market; when we offer another compromise, they will not listen to it; and the United States will lose that immense territory, a small share of which would now redeem the whole.

MARCH, 1804.

Georgia Claims.

H. OF R.

The United States cannot be a loser in this transaction; in this safe kind of compromise, it is proposed to give for the peaceable and legal title not more than one-eighth of what they have offensively obtained by the Convention with Georgia to secure the remainder; and for the whole they have not, nor are they bound to pay a single dollar out of any other fund than its own avails, while the present claimants, under the act of 1795, have honestly paid for their purchase more than three millions of dollars.

I hope it will not be thought, from what I have said, that I mean to justify or excuse the conduct of the Georgia Legislature of 1795. I mean no such thing; I detest bribery both in the giver and receiver; but how can a third person be obliged to suspect fraud, when he sees fair authenticated title-papers from a sovereign State? Every man who sees these papers naturally considers the faith of that Government pledged, and no person who is versed in the doctrines lately advanced on this floor, would think of scrupling that faith more than he would that of a well known established bank, in which case, when the paper of the bank was offered to him, his inquiry would be, is the paper counterfeit? not, did you come fairly by it, or did you cheat the agent, the clerk, or the teller of the bank out of it?

I feel myself, Mr. Speaker, justified, from the considerations I have mentioned, perfectly justified in the votes I have given, or shall give, on this subject in all its stages. Yet I must confess it is the anxious desire I have for the growth and prosperity of the Western country, that has roused my activity on the occasion. In the course of a few days, in private conversation, I have heard sentiments expressed to this purport: "Last year, when I wished that country settled in order to serve as a barrier against the encroachments of an enemy, I was willing for the compromise, but now that is not the case, I do not care whether it is settled these hundred years; I shall not vote for the compromise." It seems by this to be intended that that fine country, lying in the most delightful climate on the globe, the soil of which is capable of producing the richest fruits in the greatest abundance, shall remain a desert, while thousands of our fellow-citizens in the Eastern States, living in a state of crowded population, as it were, wrangling for a share of the barren rocks among which they cultivate a little earth, barely enough to gain a subsistence, might, if encouraged to become Western land-holders, quit their snowy mountains, and, by the abundance the Western country, cultivated by their industry, would yield yield them, could not fail of being opulent, and, in a superior degree, promoting the population and adding strength to the nation. Are gentlemen going to be governed by this narrow policy, and preserve this dispute purposely to prevent the growth of the Western country? Do they fear that country will increase too fast in political and commercial importance? Have they taken the alarm, since last year, when the law laying the foundation for this much desired compromise was popular? Do they think if people go on the lands without title, or a disputed title, they will never be otherwise than poor and trifling? Are gentlemen willing to pursue this dog-in-the-manger policy, and keep the avails of thirty-five millions of acres of those lands out of the Treasury merely to suppress the growth of that envied country? If this is the case, to be sure, they will vote to defeat the compromise.

Some gentlemen, I believe, on a former vote, held back their assent merely because the Commissioners were to have full powers to settle this controversy without recurring again to Congress; but let us consider what these plenipotentiary powers are? They extend no further than to give all the claimants one-eighth of what they bought and paid for; why then should we wish to hear any more of it? Why wish to spend another Winter upon it? The honor, the justice, and unanimity of the nation require the earliest possible finish to this business; the sooner all the disgraceful transactions attending it are buried in oblivion, the better. How can I wish to procrastinate, by withholding plenary powers, when those plenary powers are far short of the terms I have heretofore feared we should have to submit to, in order to accomplish this necessary compromise? One word on the subject of the claimants under the act of 1789. Their bargain not having been consummated by title deeds, I have never been alarmed as to their injuring the title of the United States to the land, and I have not been willing essentially to lessen the pittance allowed by Georgia to be given to those claimants, whose title would operate against that of the United States, lest by that means we should fail of the compromise; but I was always willing to give them, from some other source, whatever in equity should appear to be due them from the United States. However, I have been told that the claimants of 1795, full of the spirit of compromise, are willing that they should come in with them for that share the equity of their claim shall, in the view of the Commissioners, under every consideration, entitle them to; and I am willing, in this way, they shall be included in the bill; they are, in my opinion, included in it, and I do hope the resolutions will be amended and decided on, and that the bill will be carried through.

Mr. ELLIOT.—I am extremely happy, sir, that the task which I had assigned myself, of replying to the speeches of the gentlemen from Virginia and Delaware, has been anticipated by the able, and I will take the liberty to say, unanswerable speech of the gentleman from Kentucky. If the destinies of the American people are to be governed by the counsels of an individual; if the system of an individual is to be adopted; give me not the system of the gentleman from Delaware, or that of either of the gentlemen from Virginia, but that of the gentleman from Kentucky. He has displayed an equal superiority in argument and in correctness of principle.

In delineating our views of the tendencies of measures, it is frequently difficult to avoid the imputation of directly impeaching motives. Once for all, I declare that I shall never accuse members of this House of improper motives. Although I may think the doctrines advanced by the supporters of the resolutions extremely pernicious, invasive of the natural political order of society, and subversive not less of the State sovereignties than of social order, yet I believe those gentlemen to be as honest as myself. And I was once as enthusiastic as they are now. Personal allusions, however, I shall never suffer to pass unnoticed. An allusion is made to the fable of the viper who stung his benefactor. I hope the people, to whom the appeal is now made, and whose indignation and detestation are invoked upon those who dare to oppose the resolutions, will never have reason to accuse those young men whom they have elevated to influence and distinction, of laboring, from whatever motives, to infuse a poisonous sting, never to be eradicated, in the very vitals of the Constitution. If the gentlemen mean to insinuate that I ought to consider myself as standing on inferior ground to themselves, I will tell them that, whatever degree of popularity I may possess at this moment, I shall always claim an equality in point of integrity. And however eminent may be the talents of particular members, they can have no right themselves to claim a superiority, in that respect, over their less favored brethren.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the postponement, until the first Monday of December, of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Georgia were, at no time, invested with the power of alienating the right of soil possessed by the good people of that State, in and to the vacant territory of the same, but in a rightful manner, and for the public good:—

The question was taken that the House do agree to the motion for postponement of the said second clause of the original motion; and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 52, nays 50, as follows:

So much of the said original motion as is contained in the third clause thereof, being twice read, in the words following, to wit:

“That it is in evidence to this House, that the act of the Legislature of Georgia, passed on the seventh of January, 1795, entitled 'An act for appropriating a part of the unlocated territory of this State, for the payment of the State troops, and for other purposes,' was passed by persons under the influence of gross and palpable corruption practised by the grantees of the lands attempted to be alienated by the aforesaid act, tending to enrich and aggrandize, to a degree almost incalculable, a few individuals, and ruinous to the public interest."

The question was taken that the House do agree to the motion for postponement of the said third clause of the original motion; and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 54, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jun., Simeon Baldwin, Silas Betton, Phaniel Bishop, John Campbell, William Chamberlin, Martin Chittenden, Clifton Claggett, Jacob Crowninshield, Manasseh Cutler, Richard Cutts, John Davenport, William Dickson, Thomas Dwight, James Elliot, Ebenezer Elmer, William Eustis, William Findley, John Fowler, Andrew Gregg, Gaylord Griswold, Roger Griswold, Seth Hastings, Wm. Thompson, Abram Trigg, Isaac Van Horne, Matthew Walton, Richard Winn, and Joseph Winston.

So much of the said original motion as is contained in the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh clauses thereof, being again read, in the words following, to wit:

"That the good people of Georgia, impressed with general indignation at this act of atrocious perfidy and of unparalleled corruption, with a promptitude of decision highly honorable to their character, did, by the act of a subsequent Legislature, passed on the thirteenth of February, 1796, under circumstances of peculiar solemnity, and finally sanctioned by the people, who have subsequently ingrafted it on their constitution, declare the preceding act, and the grants made under it, in themselves null and void; that the said act should be expunged from the records of the State, and be publicly burnt, which was accordingly done; provision at the same time being made for restoring the pretended purchase-money to the grantees, by whom, or by persons claiming under them, the greater part of the said purchase-money has been withdrawn from the Treasury of Georgia."

"That a subsequent Legislature of an individual State has an undoubted right to repeal any act of a preceding Legislature; provided such repeal be not forbidden by the constitution of such State, or of the United States."

"That the aforesaid act of the State of Georgia, passed on the thirteenth of February, 1796, was forbidden neither by the constitution of that State, nor by that of the United States."

"That the claims of persons derived under the aforesaid act of the seventh of January, 1795, are recognised neither by any compact between the United States and the State of Georgia, nor any act of the Federal Government."

The question was taken that the House do agree to the motion for postponement of the said fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh clauses of the original motion; and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 53, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jun., Simeon Baldwin, Silas Betton, Phaniel Bishop, John Campbell, William Chamberlin, Martin Chittenden, Clifton Claggett, Jacob Crowninshield, Manasseh Cutler, Richard Cutts, Samuel W. Thompson, Abram Trigg, Isaac Van Horne, Matthew Walton, Richard Winn, and Joseph Winston.

And then the residue of the said original motion, contained in the eighth and last clause thereof, being twice read, in the following words, to wit:

"Therefore, resolved, That no part of the five millions of acres reserved for satisfying and quieting claims to lands ceded by the State of Georgia to the United States, and appropriated by the act of Congress passed at their last session, shall be appropriated to quiet or compensate any claims derived under any act, or pretended act of the State of Georgia, passed, or alleged to be passed, during the year 1795."

The question was taken that the House do

MONDAY, March 12.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last being read by the Clerk, a member in his place suggested an error therein, by misstating the decision of the House on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of William Eaton: Whereupon, the entry of the proceeding on the said report being read, in the words following, to wit:

“The House, according to the order of the day, proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims, of the twenty-ninth ultimo, on the petition of William Eaton; and the said report being twice read at the Clerk’s table, in the words following, to wit:

“That, so far as an examination of this case involves a consideration of the petitioner’s Consular Agency, your committee feel a pleasure in expressing their decided approbation of his official conduct. Nor do they hesitate in communicating to the House their impression that the petitioner has a well founded claim upon the Government for his sacrifices and expenditures in the public service. But as much of his demand is under a course of examination at the Treasury Department, and as it is confidently believed the Executive is both enabled and disposed to render him complete justice, your committee consider the present application as premature, and that the Legislative interference ought to be withheld until a fair opportunity shall be afforded for the adjustment of the claim by the proper officers.

‘Your committee are therefore of opinion that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition, and the papers accompanying the same.’

“The question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of Claims in their agreement to the said report,

“And resolved in the affirmative.”

A motion was made and seconded to amend the said entry, by striking out the following words:

“That, so far as an examination of this case involves a consideration of the petitioner’s Consular Agency, your committee feel a pleasure in expressing their decided approbation of his official conduct. Nor do they hesitate in communicating to the House their impression that the petitioner has a well founded claim upon the Government for his sacrifices and expenditures in the public service. But as much of his demand is under a course of examination at the Treasury Department, and as it is confidently believed the Executive is both enabled and disposed to render him complete justice, your committee consider the present application as premature, and that Legislative interference ought to be withheld until a fair opportunity shall be afforded for the adjustment of the claim by the proper officers.”

And, also, by stating that the House do agree to so much of the said report as is contained in the last clause thereof, in the words following, to wit:

And on the question to amend, it was unanimously resolved in the affirmative, every member present answering in the affirmative, to wit:

Willis Alston, junior, Isaac Anderson, John Archer, Simeon Baldwin, David Bard, George Michael Bedinger, Silas Betton, Phaniel Bishop, Adam Boyd, John Boyle, Robert Brown, Joseph Bryan, William Butler, George W. Campbell, John Campbell, Levi Casey, Clifton Claggett, Joseph Clay, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Davenport, John Dawson, William Dickson, Thomas Dwight, John B. mittee on Enrolled Bills be instructed to wait on the President of the United States, and lay before him the engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the captors of the Moorish armed ships Meshouda and Mirboha," with the several amendments, as the same was finally passed by both Houses of Congress, and to state the variance between the said engrossed bill and the enrolment thereof, as approved by the President; and to request that he will cause the said enrolled bill to be returned to this House, in which it originated, for the purpose of rendering the said bill conformable with the engrossed bill and the amendments thereto, as passed by the two Houses of Congress.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill to authorize the marshal of any district within the United States to adjourn any special or adjourned district court to the next stated term of said court, whenever the judge of the district court shall be unable to attend such adjourned or special court, and shall direct the marshal, in writing, to adjourn the same.

Ordered, That Mr. R. GRISWOLD, Mr. NICHOLSON, and Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Ordered, That this House do now attend in the Senate Chamber to hear the Senate, in their capacity of a Court of Impeachments, pronounce judgment on the articles of impeachment exhibited against John Pickering, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, agreeably to the notification contained in a message from the Senate, by their Secretary, on Saturday last.

The SPEAKER, attended by the members, accordingly withdrew to the Senate Chamber, for the purpose expressed in the foregoing order; and, being returned,

Mr. HUGER, from the committee to whom were referred, on the seventeenth ultimo, and the eighth instant, the memorials of sundry merchants of the city and State of New York, and of sundry merchants and ship owners of the city of Hudson, in the said State of New York, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to reconsider their third amendment, disagreed to by the Senate, to add a new section at the end of the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to erect a light-house on the south end of St. Simon's island, in the State of Georgia, and for the placing a buoy or buoys on or near St. Simon's bar;" as, also, to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the fourth amendment of this House to the said bill: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth recede from their said third amendment.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the amendment proposed by the Senate to the fourth amendment of this House to the said bill.

GEORGIA CLAIMS.

The House proceeded to the further consideration of the first clause of a motion of the twentieth ultimo, respecting "claimants to lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee, under an act of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, passed in the year 1795;" and the said first clause of the motion being again read, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Georgia were at no time invested with the power of alienating the right of soil possessed by the good people of that State in and to the vacant territory of the same, but in a rightful manner, and for the public good."

A motion was made, and the question being put that the further consideration thereof be postponed until the first Monday in November next, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The House then proceeded to consider the bill providing for the settlement of sundry claims to public lands lying south of Tennessee, to which the Committee of the whole House, to whom it was referred, reported an amendment on the seventh instant: Whereupon, a motion was made, and the question being put that the further consideration of the said bill be postponed until the first Monday in November next, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 59, nays 49, as follows:

Official Conduct of Judge Chase.

MARCH, 1804.

OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF JUDGE CHASE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee appointed "to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase, one of the associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of Richard Peters, district judge of the district of Pennsylvania," made the sixth instant. The report is as follows:

That in consequence of the evidence collected by them, in virtue of the powers with which they have been invested by the House, and which is hereunto subjoined, they are of opinion,

1. That Samuel Chase, Esq., one of the associates justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

2. That Richard Peters, district judge of the district of Pennsylvania, has not so acted in his judiciary capacity as to require the interposition of the Constitutional powers of this House."

On reading the first resolution, for the impeachment of Samuel Chase—

Mr. ELLIOT said: Mr. Chairman, I have undertaken this day, in a manner neither copious nor tedious, to examine the relative rights of judges and of private citizens. The task is an important one, and I have only to regret that it very far transcends my feeble powers.

In the immense volume of the history of the human mind, there are no sections more interesting than those which develop the latent springs of human action, and record the effects of the spirit of party upon the wisest and the best of men. It is impossible, however, to judge of causes otherwise than by consequences, of motives otherwise than by actions. On an occasion like the present, it is our duty to discard the pride of party and the pride of power. But I have not risen to deliver a moral or political lecture to the Committee; I have risen for a very different purpose. As my opinions upon this subject are probably peculiar to myself, I have opened the discussion with a view to preclude myself from taking any part in the extensive debates which the subject can scarcely fail of producing hereafter. My views shall be succinct, and I will not wander, even for a moment, from the real question.

The resolution under consideration contemplates the impeachment of Samuel Chase, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, upon a charge of high crimes and misdemeanors. Although I doubt whether Judge Chase has been guilty of any act which can with propriety be called a high crime, yet he appears to me to have committed one or two misdemeanors. I shall, therefore, under my present impressions, be compelled to vote in favor of the resolution; but my mind is open to conviction, and I hope to be enlightened, if I have unfortunately fallen into error. To misdemeanor is to behave ill; a misdemeanor is an act of ill behaviour; and the Constitution limits the duration of the office of a judge to the period of his good behaviour. I am not of opinion that every act which, strictly speaking, may be considered as misconduct, ought to subject a judge to impeachment; the misconduct must possess some degree of criminality. In England, it has long been the practice, and the practice has grown into law, to give great latitude to the discretion of judges; to presume, unless the contrary appears by incontestable evidence, that their errors are the errors of judgment, and not to punish them for any error of judgment whatever. It accords with my disposition to adopt, in their full extent, those equitable maxims of the British code. I have no wish to adopt the principle, de uno crimine disce omnes, or to embrace the idea of novum crimen, et ante hanc diem inauditum. From the proof of one act of misconduct, I will not presume the existence of others; nor will I create new crimes, unknown till this moment.

Except in relation to the trial of James Thompson Callender, I have discovered no ground of impeachment against Mr. Chase; and I will concisely examine the voluminous testimony before us, from which ingenuity may extract a variety of other accusations. The first charge will be, that John Fries, when arraigned for treason, was deprived of a Constitutional trial, by the arbitrary conduct of the court. Candor, however, after an impartial review of all the circumstances of the case, will make a different decision. It appears, by the testimony of Mr. Lewis;

"That Judge Chase, at the moment when Fries was placed at the bar, handed or threw down to Mr. Caldwell, the clerk of the court, one or more papers, and at the same time delivered himself, in substance, as follows: That he understood, or had been informed, that on the former trial or trials, there had been great waste of time, by counsel making long speeches to the jury on the law as well as on the facts, and on matters which had nothing to do with the business before the court, and he particularly noticed, in strong and pointed terms of disapprobation, their having read, and I think having been permitted to read, certain parts of certain statutes of the United States, relating to crimes less than treason, in order to show that the prisoner's case came within them, and which he said, he, or the court, (I do not recollect which,) would not suffer to be read again, as they had nothing to do with the question. He added, that we are judges of the law and understand it, or we are not fit to sit here; that cases at the common law, or under the statute law of England previous to the English revolution, had nothing to do with the question, and that they would not suffer them to be read; that they had made up their mind on the law, and had reduced it to writing, and that the counsel might conduct themselves accordingly, (or conformably to it,) he or they had ordered copies of it to be made, and one of them to be delivered to the counsel in support of the prosecution, and another to the prisoner's counsel, and that as soon as the case was opened or gone through (I am not sure which was the expression) on the part of the prosecution, he or they (I am not certain which) should order one to be delivered to the jury. He also added that, if we had any fault to find with the opinion of the court, or had anything to say on the law, to show that they were wrong or had mistaken it, we must address ourselves to the court, and not to the jury."

This is the evidence which I consider as material to the first point in question. Although the jury are to decide both the law and the fact in criminal cases, I have never heard it doubted that the court have a right to deliver their opinion upon the law, at any stage of the trial. But it is said that by this oppressive conduct of the court the prisoner was deprived of the benefit of counsel. In order to form a correct opinion upon this point, it is necessary to consider the conduct of the court in the first instance, that of the counsel in consequence, and that of the court which followed. That I may save the time of the Committee, I will endeavor to show from memory the substance of the volume of evidence on the table, although I have had very little time to prepare myself for this discussion. Of course the testimony of Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Dallas, and Mr. Rawle, must be in some measure blended. It appears that the learned counsel considered the conduct of the court as unprecedented, injurious to the prisoner, and invasive of the rights of the bar; and they declined to proceed in the defence. The trial, however, was not precipitated. In the evening Mr. Chase became sensible that he had committed an error. The next day he told the counsel: "You are not bound by the opinion delivered yesterday, but may contest it on both sides." "You are at liberty to proceed as fully as you think proper; address the jury, and lay down the law as you think proper." "Having thus explained the meaning of the court, you will stand acquitted or condemned to your own consciences, as you think proper to act. Do as you please." Judge Peters asked, if an error had been committed would not the counsel suffer it to be corrected? I ask so too. Why did they not suffer it to be corrected? Could a court ever descend deeper into the valley of humiliation? Why deny to judges, the privilege so dear and so necessary to all men, that of correcting their mistakes? But the counsel were of opinion that there had been a prejudication of the cause. No such thing. When the court thus retraced the ground they had first trodden, I am clear that the general impression upon the minds of the jurors, resulting from the conduct of the court, would have been favorable to the prisoner rather than otherwise. We find, in the testimony of Mr. Dallas, the real reason for the strange conduct of the counsel: "Mr. Lewis and myself were greatly influenced in the conduct which we pursued, by our opinion of the means most likely to save the life of Fries, under all the circumstances of his case." They anticipated his pardon by the President, if condemned without counsel. I have formed a decided opinion that Fries was not, by any misconduct of the court, deprived of the Constitutional privilege of being heard by counsel, and of course that there exists no ground for impeachment, as it respects that trial.

I presume the Committee of Inquiry were of opinion that the conduct of the judge in the case of Cooper, was improper. Mr. Cooper was indicted for a libel on the President; he offered to give the truth in evidence, and applied for a subpoena for the President himself as a witness, which was very properly refused. Suppose a subpoena had issued. The President of the United States would have commanded the marshal to summon the President of the United States into court. He disobeys the summons. The President then commands the marshal to attach the President. Is not this absurd? Not that I think the President ought to be above attending any court as a witness, in criminal or civil cases. But it is presumed that his whole time is devoted to the important concerns of the nation, concerns infinitely more important than those of any individuals. If he cannot be prevailed upon, or cannot make it convenient, to appear in court, he certainly cannot be compelled to do it. But for what purpose was the testimony of the President wanted? Contrary to every principle of law and to the dictates of common sense, to criminate himself! Is not this absurdity rendered still more absurd?

By the testimony of Mr. Mason and Mr. Smith, it appears that Judge Chase delivered a charge to a grand jury at Baltimore, "in which there was much political matter. He spoke of the act of Congress, entitled 'An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of certain courts of the United States, and for other purposes,' as alarming and dangerous in its tendencies, as it went to destroy the independence of the Judiciary. He inveighed in very strong terms against the amendment made by the Legislature of Maryland to their State constitution," &c. Next to the holy altars of religion, I consider the temple of justice as the most improper place from whence to dispense the dogmas of party, or the theories of political disquisition. I have felt much indignation at such conduct heretofore, and have always considered it as highly improper, but not as criminal. When I was one of that class of citizens who composed the minority on political questions generally, I believed that I had a right to examine and censure the measures of Government; and I believe that judges possess the same political rights as private citizens, although the bench may be a very improper situation in which to exercise them. This charge cannot constitute any good ground for an impeachment.

It is to me a subject of no small regret, that the deposition of Jonathan Snowden has found a place in this voluminous collection of evidence. Mr. Snowden has undoubtedly testified the truth, but I object to the nature of the testimony. To take any notice of it would be inconsistent with the dignity of the grand inquest of the nation. Judge Chase is stated to have said to Judge Washington: "To tell you the truth, if I had known then as much as I do now, I should not have fined him (Callender) so high." From the testimony of gentlemen of high respectability, who were present on that occasion, it appears that the conversation was of a sportive nature, and in common charity we should have presumed that it was so. From an incautious expression in the moment of convivial amusement, shall we deduce the conclusion that the judge was governed by corrupt motives in the conviction of Callender?

In the trial of Callender, indeed, I believe the judge to have been guilty of such misconduct as ought to render him impeachable. I have not formed this opinion without experiencing many doubts and difficulties, which I shall be happy to have completely removed; and I shall be equally happy to be convinced that I have done wrong in concluding to vote for the impeachment. The Constitution secures to persons accused of crimes, the right of compulsory process to procure witnesses, and trial by jury. From the testimony of Mr. Hay and Mr. Nicholas, it appears that Callender was deprived of those great Constitutional privileges. However atrocious the libel or the libeller, there should have been a fair trial. A motion was made for a continuance, upon the facts stated in an affidavit which is now before us. I have examined it, and it appears to me to have been sufficient to sustain the motion; and we are told that the motion was urged on Constitutional grounds. Mr. Hay says:

"The witnesses were named, the evidence expected from each distinctly stated, and the documents wanted clearly specified. When this affidavit was presented to the court, it was urged by the counsel that the Constitution secured to the prisoner a right to process to enforce the attendance of his witnesses. He had also a right, under the Constitution, to the assistance of counsel in his defence; but if he were tried when his witnesses were absent, and his counsel not prepared for his defence, without any default in him or them, these important provisions would be useless. The motion was instantly overruled. The Attorney for the United States was told that it was unnecessary to reply. Judge Chase said that it would be a waste of time; that there was no reason for putting off the trial; that as the prisoner did not swear that he could prove all the facts recited in the indictment, his having testimony as to part of them was immaterial. He must prove all, continued Judge Chase, and it must appear that he can prove all, or the trial will not be postponed."

"Mr. Nicholas says—We renewed the motion, and it was urged with great earnestness, under a conviction that a fair trial could not be had without Callender's witnesses, and that as many of them lived at the distance of several hundred miles, and the prosecution had originated only a few days before, it was impossible that Callender could have procured their attendance. We thought also, that he had a Constitutional right to obtain compulsory process to compel the attendance of his witnesses. The court refused to grant a continuance, and Judge Chase declared as the reason why the continuance was refused, that Callender had not stated in his affidavit that he could prove the truth of all the charges stated in the indictment; that it was necessary that he should prove the truth of all the charges to obtain an acquittal, and that as the witnesses who were absent were to give evidence as to part of the charges only, their absence afforded no good reason for a continuance."

Such are the facts in evidence. I think it cannot be denied that Judge Chase denied to Callender a Constitutional privilege; and I am equally clear, if I may be permitted to say so, that the reasons which he gave for the denial were repugnant to the most plain and obvious principles of law. By the law upon which Callender was indicted, he had the right to give the truth in evidence, and the jury had the power to determine both the law and the fact. Judge Chase declared that he must prove all the charges, or be convicted. Was not this unreasonable? I will take it upon me to repeat that this decision was contrary to law and reason. Callender had the right to select one of the charges, or any number he pleased, prove them true, and contend that the remaining charges contained no libellous matter; and if the jury had been of that opinion, they must have acquitted him. Another Constitutional right, that of trial by an impartial jury, was also denied:

"Mr. Nicholas.—We mean to challenge the array and take every advantage which the laws of the country give us. In support of this doctrine I will read an extract from "Trials per Pais." [Here he read the passage.] I believe there is testimony in court to prove that one of the jurors returned by the marshal has expressed sentiments hostile to the traverser. It is like a case stated in the books, where a verdict was set aside because a jurymen had previously said that the man accused ought to be hanged; and in that case, on the second trial, every jurymen was called on to say whether he had formed an opinion on the subject or not."

I am willing to admit that the law relied on by Mr. Nicholas is of modern date, and by some considered as not perfectly established in criminal cases, probably for the reason mentioned by Judge Chase, that the whole country may have heard of the crime and the criminal, and formed an opinion. It is clear from the books that it is settled in civil cases, and it is certainly in itself very reasonable.

"The court having refused to continue the cause, the jury was called, and one of the counsel for the defendant stated to the court that, he wished to ask the juror who was called to the book, before he was sworn, whether he had formed an opinion on the work, entitled 'The Prospect Before Us,' from which the charges in the indictment were extracted? Judge Chase said no such question should be asked; that the only question which would be allowed, was, whether the juror had formed and delivered an opinion on the charges contained in the indictment? The juror answered that he had never seen the indictment nor heard it read. The judge directed that he should be sworn in chief. The counsel then asked that the indictment should be read to the juror, which might enable him to decide whether he had formed and delivered an opinion on the charges in the indictment. Judge Chase said the court would not permit this."

Mr. Robertson testifies that the Judge said, "He has answered that he never saw the indictment nor heard it read, and if he has neither read nor heard the charges, I am sure he cannot have formed or delivered an opinion on the subject."

Here I cannot but remark, that this conclusion of the Judge was extremely illogical. Because he refused to let the juror know what the charge was, he concluded that the juror could not have formed an opinion. Mr. Robertson afterwards says:

"The eighth juror answered, when the previous question was put to him, that though he had never read or heard the charges in the indictment, and knew not what the traverser had published, yet he had formed an unequivocal opinion that such a book as the 'Prospect Before Us' was, came within the sedition law. But no objection was made to him, and he was sworn like the rest."

It may be asked why no objection was made?

H. OF R.

The answer is ready; Judge Chase had prejudged that the objection was not a good one: but I think differently, and believe that it was his duty to set aside the eighth juror. I cannot, and will not believe, with this evidence staring me in the face, that Callender was tried by an impartial jury of his country; the eighth juror at least, must have possessed a mind far from impartial towards the author of The Prospect. It is proved that the Judge denied to the prisoner the great Constitutional privileges of compulsory process for witnesses, and trial by an impartial jury; but we shall be told that these were errors in judgment. I do not suspect him of corruption, but I believe him to be impeachable for conduct of this description, whether it be the consequence of passion, prepossession, or party-spirit. To allow judges to disregard the Constitution, and shelter themselves under the doctrine that they are not punishable for errors of judgment, would be giving them a dangerous latitude indeed. It is true that Judge Chase, in the latter part of the trial, appears to have been cool and candid.

I am a friend to the Constitutional independence of the Judiciary, but opposed to giving that department an oppressive and overwhelming power, destructive to the liberties of the people. I regret extremely that it has become our duty to accuse a man so eminent for talents and learning, particularly for legal learning, of high crimes and misdemeanors. I wish I could ascribe his conduct to the passion of the moment, or to those ordinary prejudices which invariably constitute a part of the infirmities of human nature. I consider myself as one of a numerous band of sentinels posted around the temple of justice. It is our duty to guard it with more than vestal vigilance, and to prepare punishment for those who appear to us to have presumed, with unhallowed hands, to minister at its sacred altars!

The question was then taken on agreeing to the first resolution, and carried—yeas 74.

The Committee then agreed, without a division, to the second resolution relating to Richard Peters.

The Committee rose, and reported their agreement to the report of the select committee.

The House immediately took the report into consideration.

The first resolution respecting Mr. Chase having been read,

Mr. R. GRISWOLD observed that in the select committee appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase there had been no discussion, and no points settled, except those contained in the resolution. No part of the documents contained in the report had been taken up and discussed. I would, said Mr. G., myself have undertaken on this occasion to enter minutely into the testimony, were I not of opinion that the sentiments of the House are already formed. I have examined the depositions critically, and I am ready to say that they constitute no grounds for impeachment. But I have been lamentably convinced, by a mournful experience, that nothing which can be said in the case of impeachments will have any effect on this House. I shall therefore, say nothing on this resolution, at this time; but shall content myself with calling for the yeas and nays.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—Like the gentleman from Connecticut, it is no part of my intention to enter into a consideration of the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Mr. Chase and Mr. Peters. On this occasion, as on another, in which I had the honor of being one of those to whom was confided the management of an impeachment, I am willing to rest the decision which I shall give on the testimony before the House. But I think the observations which have fallen from the gentleman from Connecticut require, in justice to himself (for he was a member of the committee appointed on this occasion,) and as an act of justice to that committee, some remarks in reply. For what purpose he has made these observations I shall not undertake to determine. From them it would appear as if a discussion had been particularly invited. The committee consisted of seven members. On the motion of different members, sometimes in consequence of personal application, at other times by letters, addressed to the committee, testimony was ordered to be taken. A day was then appointed for the meeting of the committee; they did meet. At the time appointed for the meeting some gentlemen of the committee were engaged in the character of managers of an impeachment before the Senate. The gentleman from Connecticut, and a gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HUGER,) also a member of the committee, waited in the library until the other members thus engaged should be in readiness. As soon as they were ready to meet, a message was sent to the library for the two gentlemen. Before this it had been intimated to the managers that the House wanted a quorum. We, therefore, dispatched a message into the House for the two gentlemen. We received no answer. The committee decided the conduct of Mr. Chase impeachable, in relation to the trial of Fries, and the conduct of Mr. Peters not impeachable. In consequence of this decision, five members being present, the Chairman was directed to draught the report. The report, however, not being presented, owing to the adjournment of the House, and the committee being unwilling to submit it before it had been considered by all the members of the committee, it was again submitted to the committee, who were summoned, for that purpose, the next morning; when it was reconsidered, and agreed to in the presence of the members previously absent.

Mr. R. concluded by expressing his regret at having to trouble the House with so dry a detail; and said he had made it to show, that if there had been no discussion, it was because there was an indisposition on either side to provoke it.

Mr. HUGER.—It was my wish and determination to have avoided saying anything on the present question, and to have contented myself with giving a silent vote—nor should I now have risen but for the allusions, which have been made by the gentlemen from Connecticut and from Virginia, to what took place in the Committee of Investigation. The statements given by both these gentlemen are, as far as they go, correct; but I must beg leave to add one or two additional observations on the subject.

The committee had been duly summoned to meet on the morning of the day preceding that on which the report now under consideration was presented to this House. Both the members from Connecticut and myself accordingly attended at, or about the usual hour of attendance; but on going to the room, in which we had always met, we found it occupied by the committee who had been appointed to impeach Judge Pickering. Most, I believe indeed, all the gentlemen, except the member from Connecticut and myself, who composed the Committee of Investigation, were likewise members of the committee, and as they had already met on other business, we of course retired. On my return to the House, I met the honorable Chairman at the door, who expressed a wish that our committee should forthwith meet; but on my observing, that the most of the members of it were on the Committee of Impeachment in the case of Judge Pickering, which was then assembled, he proceeded to join them; intimating, if I did not mistake him, as he left me, that he would send me word should our committee meet. I received no message, however, nor heard anything on the subject until a few minutes before the House adjourned, when to my astonishment the gentleman from Connecticut informed me that he had been told the committee had met during our absence, and come to the determination of reporting to the House a resolution recommending the impeachment of Judge Chase.

The gentleman from Virginia, however, has informed the House that before the committee proceeded to business, one or two messengers had been sent to summon both my friend from Connecticut and myself, and he had before given me the same information in private. And most certainly, sir, I have not the smallest doubt but that this was done; for the assertion of any fact, made by the gentleman from Virginia, will ever receive from me the most ready and implicit belief. It nevertheless, so happened, that neither the member from Connecticut nor myself received the summons, or attended the committee, in which it was determined, during our absence, that a report should be drawn up and made to the House, recommending the impeachment of Judge Chase. This circumstance did, I confess, surprise me in the first instance, and until the matter was explained to me. I still regret it; for we had never had any previous discussion in the committee, on the merits of the various charges exhibited against the judge, and I certainly did expect, that each particular case would have been thoroughly sifted and canvassed in the select committee, and a separate and distinct vote taken on each of them before any report was made. Under this impression I had intended to have objected, had I been present, to the committee's coming to any final decision until we had received the deposition of Mr. Robertson from Petersburg; and I had also (as I observed to the committee on the following morning) intended to have requested, that the depositions of Mr. Edmond Randolph, late Attorney General of the United States, and some other gentlemen, (whom I had just learned were present at the trial of Callender,) might be taken; for as the only depositions before us in this case were solely those of the parties immediately and individually concerned, and who were not merely the political opponents of Judge Chase, but personally interested; as the propriety of their own conduct in the trial was involved in the question at issue between them and the judge. I did not wish to make up my mind, or give a final vote on a case, in which there was evidently no other than perfectly ex parte evidence before us. The committee, however, having, as has been stated, met during our absence, and decided in favor of an impeachment, I was virtually precluded from making the proposition I had intended.

It is indeed true, Mr. Speaker, and the gentleman from Virginia is perfectly correct in stating, "that the whole of the committee met the next day, and the report, as it now stands, was submitted to our final decision, when every individual member was present." He is equally correct in the observation, that the report was open to the objections, which might be offered from any quarter. But, after five out of seven members had already on the preceding day decided in favor of the principle it contained, I certainly, sir, had not the vanity to suppose that anything I could say would effect a change of opinion; and I conceived, that after what had passed, it would be regarded as mere cavil on my part, and only done from a wish to embarrass and create unnecessary delay, to propose, when the question of impeachment was already acted and decided upon, that we should wait for further testimony. I therefore acquiesced, and (after having expressed, as above stated, what I should have wished to have been done, and had intended to propose, had I been present in the committee the preceding day) I deemed it my duty, (as believing the evidence in question before us, to be entirely ex parte) to give in the select committee, as I shall again do on the present occasion, my decided negative to that part of the report, which includes the resolution for impeaching Judge Chase.

The question was then taken, by yeas and nays, on concurring in the report of the committee, agreeing to the first resolution, and carried—yeas 73, nays 32, as follows:

The report of the committee, in relation to the second resolution, was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH moved that a Committee be appointed to appear at the bar of the Senate, to impeach, in the name of the House of Representatives, Samuel Chase, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

The motion was adopted, and Messrs. J. RANDOLPH and EARLY appointed the committee.

TUESDAY, March 13.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee to whom were referred, on the twenty-fifth of January last, the memorials of Alexander Moultrie, of the State of South Carolina, in behalf of himself and others; and of the Virginia Yazoo Company, by William Cowan, their agent, together with the report of a select committee thereon; made a supplementary report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LATTIMORE, from the committee appointed on the tenth instant, presented, according to order, a bill to suspend, for a limited time, the execution of a part of the twelfth section of the act, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That there shall be a call of the House at ten o'clock each morning, during the present session; and there shall be deducted one day's pay from the compensation of each member who shall fail of attending such call, unless he shall render to the House satisfactory reasons for such neglect:

The question was taken that the House do now proceed to take the said motion into consideration, and passed in the negative.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House of the twelfth instant, "to instruct the Joint Committee of Enrolled Bills to wait on the President of the United States respecting a variance between an engrossed and enrolled bill," also to the resolution of this House, of the sixth instant, for an adjournment of the two Houses of Congress, with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for carrying into effect the Convention between the United States and the King of Spain, on the eleventh of August, 1802," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making provision for the disposal of the public lands in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

The said bill was then further amended at the Clerk's table, and, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed on the twelfth instant, reported—

That, in obedience to the order of the House, the committee had been to the Senate, and in the name of the House of Representatives, and of the people of the United States, had impeached Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and had acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles against him, and make good the same.

And further: That the committee had demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Samuel Chase, to answer to the said impeachment.

On motion, it was,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, who has been impeached by this House, during the present session, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. JOSEPH CLAY, Mr. EARLY, and Mr. BOYLE, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, who were directed by a resolution of this House, of the second ultimo, "to inquire into, and report their opinion upon the expediency of discontinuing the allowance of drawbacks of the duties on spirits, gunpowder, soap, candles, and playing cards of foreign manufacture; and of allowing, in lieu of drawbacks, — per gallon on all spirits exported both of foreign and domestic manufacture," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the tenth instant, the bill for imposing more specific duties on the importation of certain articles; and, also, for levying and collecting light money on foreign ships or vessels.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate, to the resolution for an adjournment of the two Houses of Congress; and the said amendment being to strike out the word "third," next before the words "Monday, in the present month," and, in lieu thereof, to insert the word "fourth," was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for carrying into effect the Convention between the United States and the King of Spain, on the eleventh of August 1802." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do agree to the said amendments.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole on the report of the Committee of the sixth instant, to whom was referred, on the twenty-second ultimo, the Message from the President of the United States, communicating a report of the Surveyor of the Public Buildings at the City of Washington; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon; which as read as follows:

Resolved, That fifty thousand dollars ought to be appropriated, to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, in proceeding with the public buildings at Washington; and in making such necessary improvements and repairs thereon, as he shall deem expedient.

The House proceeded to consider the said resolution: Whereupon, the question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement to the same; and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 57, nays 23, as follows:

Mr. J. CLAY moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to lay and collect, by law, a tonnage duty on vessels employed in foreign commerce, which may enter the port of Philadelphia, not exceeding four cents per ton, on vessels of one hundred and fifty tons burden, and upwards; and not exceeding two cents per ton on vessels under one hundred and fifty tons burden; for any period of time not exceeding five years, to constitute a fund for improving the port of Philadelphia, and for removing obstructions to the navigation of the river Delaware; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

The House proceeded to consider the said motion at the Clerk's table: When, an adjournment being called for, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 14.

A petition of sundry citizens of Washington, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, praying that an act may be passed by Congress to enable the petitioners and others interested therein, to form an incorporated company, by shares transferable, for the purpose of carrying on commercial and banking business within the said District.

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHILL, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill for the relief of the heirs of John Habersham; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the committee appointed yesterday, presented a bill concerning the public buildings at the City of Washington; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. GAYLORD GRISWOLD, from the committee appointed on the twenty-fifth of November last, who were directed, by a resolution of this House, of the twenty-second ultimo, "to inquire whether it be necessary to extend Federal jurisdiction to the ordinary court or courts, to be organized for that special purpose, in the Mississippi Territory of the United States," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act providing for the expenses of the civil government of Louisiana," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The said proceedings of the Senate are as follows:

DOLPH and Mr. EARLY, at the bar of the Senate, impeached Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same.

"And likewise demanded, that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Samuel Chase, to answer to the said impeachment: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate will take proper order thereon, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate notify the House of Representatives of this resolution."

"Attest, SAM. A. OTIS, Sec."

The House took up Mr. J. CLAY's resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Legislature of Pennsylvania to lay a certain tonnage duty for improving the navigation of the river Delaware and the port of Philadelphia.

After a few remarks made by Mr. C. in support of the resolution, it was negatived—ayes 36 noes 42.

GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, from the Senate, providing for the government of Louisiana.

Mr. LEIB moved to amend the section fixing the salary of the Governor of Orleans, by striking out five thousand dollars, for the purpose of inserting three thousand dollars.

The sum of five thousand dollars was, he observed, higher than that allowed some of our Heads of Department, and was, in his opinion, above the necessary allowance.

Mr. NICHOLSON said he should have no objection to striking out five thousand dollars; but it would be for the purpose of inserting a higher sum. The office of Governor of this Territory was unquestionably one of the most important under the Government of the United States. In casting his eyes on those persons competent to a discharge of the great duties attached to the office of Governor, Mr. N. said, his mind had settled upon few individuals with whom it was satisfied. So impressed was he with the importance of the station, that he would agree to give the Governor a salary equal to that allowed to any foreign Minister. A man ought to be appointed, possessed of, and entitled to the full confidence of the Executive, and who, by his manners, character, and conduct, would win the esteem and love of those over whom he is called to preside. It was also well known to the members of the House that the expenses of living were greater at New Orleans than in any part of the United States. Hitherto the Governor of Spain had received a salary of eight thousand dollars. To give the Governor the paltry sum of three thousand dollars will not enable him to pay his expenses. For these reasons Mr. N. called for a division of the question.

The question was put on the striking out five thousand dollars, and passed in the negative—ayes 40, noes 44.

Mr. LEIB moved an amendment extending to the inhabitants of Louisiana the naturalization act of the United States.
8th CON.—38

Mr. R. GRISWOLD opposed the amendment, from an impression that it was not expedient to vest the courts of Louisiana with the power of naturalization.

Mr. J. CLAY supported the amendment; as it went to extend to the inhabitants of Louisiana the privileges promised them by the treaty. Whether the proposed amendment would have this effect, he was not ready to say. If it would not, he hoped his colleague would move one that would have that effect. This privilege had been promised and ought to be granted. He presumed that a residence of five years would be required, as the privileges promised were to be received under the Constitution. Mr. C. concluded by saying there was a wide difference between naturalizing the inhabitants of Louisiana, and admitting them into the Union, and though gentlemen might have objections to the one object, they ought not, on the same ground, to object to the other.

The question was taken on the proposed amendment, and passed in the negative—ayes 32.

Mr. SLOAN moved an amendment inhibiting the admission of slaves into Louisiana, as well from the United States, as from foreign places.

Mr. S. concisely stated his reasons in favor of this provision, when the question was taken, and the amendment agreed to—ayes 40, noes 36.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL proposed an amendment, withholding from the parties to a civil suit the right of waiving a jury trial. The bill provides a jury trial in all cases in which either party shall require it.

This amendment, after being supported by Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL; and opposed by Messrs. HOLLAND, SOUTHARD, and DANA, was negatived—ayes 12.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL moved to strike out that part of the bill which renders every person settling on lands of the United States liable to a fine of one thousand dollars, and to one year's imprisonment.

This produced a debate of some length, and more animation: in which the motion to strike out was urged by Messrs. G. W. CAMPBELL, LYON, and CLAIBORNE; and opposed by Messrs. GREGG, NICHOLSON, BOYD, SMILIE, MACON, SLOAN, and HOLLAND.

The question was taken, and the amendment was negatived—ayes 23.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, offered the following new section:

"And be it further enacted, That all grants for lands within the territories ceded by the French Republic to the United States, by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three, the title whereof was, at the date of the Treaty of Ildefonso, in the Crown, Government, or nation of Spain, and every act and proceeding subsequent thereto of whatever nature, towards the obtaining any grant, title, or claim, to such lands, and under whatsoever authority transacted, or pretended, be, and the same are hereby declared to be, and to have been from the beginning, null and void, and of no effect, in law or equity."

Mr. EARLY said, he hoped this resolution would not be adopted. He was opposed to it for special as well as general reasons. It declared null and void, not only all grants or titles obtained since the period of cession, but likewise all grants or titles acquired subsequently to the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, or, in other words, during the time the territory belonged to France. He believed it was well understood that after France obtained the country a number of grants had been made. It was certain that the French Government was invested with authority to make grants, and I think, said Mr. E., a legislative declaration that such grants are void, extremely improper. This is the particular reason for which I am opposed to the amendment. I have also a general reason against it. I consider a Legislative body undertaking to declare a grant null and void an assumption of power. If a grant, whether it be of land, or to any corporate body, be null and void, it is so without any Legislative provision. It may be said, however, that such a provision is innocent. I do not think so; because it involves an assumption of power, which is in its nature judicial, exclusively judicial. For these reasons I am opposed to the resolution.

H. of R.

Louisiana Territory.

MARCH, 1804.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, said, in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, he would only read the first article of the Treaty of Cession. [Here Mr. R. read the first article.] This, said he, is a sufficient answer to the first argument of the gentleman. As to the second part of his reason, it is only necessary to say, that in order to enable the courts of justice to decide properly, laws must be passed fixing the principles on which courts are to decide.

Mr. NICHOLSON said he thought this was a subject on which the House ought not to act at present. It seemed to imply an unwarrantable suspicion of the Government of Spain. It would be sufficient time to act when they obtained correct information.

Mr. GREGG said there was one reason which would induce him to vote for the resolution. Certain fraudulent grants appear to have been made. Without some notice of them now, second purchasers will be hereafter coming forward to Congress, and will say that they had no knowledge of the fraud. He should therefore vote for the resolution.

Mr. HOLLAND expressed the same ideas with Mr. GREGG.

Mr. NICHOLSON observed, that as he was persuaded the amendment would have the effect stated by the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and North Carolina, he had no objection to it.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, moved the following as a new section, which was likewise agreed to without debate:

"And the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated by law, is hereby appropriated to enable the President of the United States to effect the object expressed in this section."

Mr. EARLY moved the following as a substitute for the fourth section:

"SEC. 4. The Legislative power shall be vested in the Governor, and in thirteen of the most fit and discreet persons of the Territory, to be called the Legislative Council, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States from among those holding real estate therein, and who shall have resided one year at least in the said Territory, and hold no office of profit under the Territory, or the United States, to serve one year from the time of their appointment: And the said Legislative Council shall, at their first session, lay off or divide the said Territory into convenient counties or districts, and apportion among them, according to their respective numbers, the thirteen members of the said Legislative Council, who shall, after the expiration of one year from the time of their first appointment, be chosen annually by all the free male white persons of the age of twenty-one years, who were resident in said Territory on the thirtieth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, and who had been resident therein one whole year next before the election, on their producing satisfactory proof to the officers of the elections that they have taken an oath of allegiance to the United States, agreeably to an act of Congress passed on the fourteenth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and two, entitled 'An act to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject;' and by citizens of the United States, who may since that time have become residents in said Territory, and who shall have resided therein one whole year, six months of that time next before the election, to be in the district or county in which he or they shall vote; and the Legislative Council, so chosen as aforesaid, shall have power to fix the times and places, and to determine the manner of holding the said elections, and to judge of the qualifications of the members and the validity of their elections. But if any of the said districts or counties shall refuse or neglect to make such election for one month after the time appointed for holding the same, then the Governor, with the Council, shall appoint a person or persons, who shall reside within the district, and be qualified as aforesaid, to serve for the district or county so neglecting or refusing. The Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Council, or a majority of them, shall have power to alter, modify, or repeal, the laws which may be in force at the commencement of this act. Their Legislative powers shall also extend to all the rightful powers of legislation; but no law shall be valid, which is inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, or which shall lay any person under restraint, burden, or disability, on account of his religious opinions, professions, or worship, in all which he shall be free to maintain his own, and not burdened for those of another. The Governor shall publish throughout the said Territory all the laws which shall be made, and shall from time to time report the same to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress, which, if disapproved by Congress, shall thenceforth be of no force. The Governor, or Legislative Council, shall have no power over the primary disposal of the soil, nor to tax the lands of the United States, nor interfere with the claims to land within the said Territory. The Governor shall convene and prorogue the Legislative Council, whenever he may deem it expedient. It shall be his duty to obtain all the information in his power in relation to the customs, habits, and dispositions of the inhabitants of the said Territory, and communicate the same from time to time to the President of the United States."

Government of the Army.

H. OF R.

The Committee now rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. NICHOLSON said it had been for some time in contemplation to establish a branch bank at New Orleans. The business had been before the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, who were of opinion that they were not authorized to establish the branch. He therefore moved that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to prepare and report a bill authorizing the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States to establish offices of discount and deposit in any of the territories and dependencies of the United States.

The motion was immediately agreed to, and Mr. NICHOLSON reported a bill for that purpose.

The bill making provision for disposing of the public lands in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes, was read the third time and passed.

THURSDAY, March 15.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Agreeably to the request of the Senate and House of Representatives, delivered to me by their Joint Committee of Enrolled Bills, I now return the enrolled bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the captors of the Moorish armed ships Meshouda and Mirboha," to the House of Representatives, in which it originated.

TH. JEFFERSON.

MARCH 15, 1804.

Ordered, That the said Message, together with the enrolled bill, be referred to the Joint Committee for Enrolled Bills, with instruction to correct the variance between the engrossed bill, with the amendments thereto, as passed by both Houses, and the enrolment thereof, and report the same to the two Houses.

Mr. ROGER GRISWOLD, from the committee appointed on the twelfth instant, presented, according to order, a bill to authorize the adjournment of district courts by Marshals in certain cases; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States;" which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act providing for the expenses of the civil government of Louisiana; whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do agree to the said amendments.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning the public buildings at the city of Washington; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the heirs of John Habersham; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported two amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of David Valenzin, deceased, and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with two amendments; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject;" and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with an amendment, which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels;" and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with an amendment, and was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, do lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for defraying the expenses incurred in inquiring into the official conduct of Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, and in conducting the impeachment against John Pickering;" with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

GOVERNMENT OF THE ARMY.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill providing rules for the government of the Army.

The fifth article is in the words following:

"ART. 5. Whatsoever officer or soldier shall presume to use traitorous or disrespectful words against the President of the United States, against the Vice President thereof, against the Congress of the United States, or against the Chief Magistrate, or Legislature of any of the United States, in which he may be quartered, if a commissioned officer, he shall be cashiered or otherwise punished as a Court Martial shall direct; if a non-commissioned officer or soldier, he shall suffer such punishment as shall be inflicted on him by the sentence of a Court Martial."

Mr. NICHOLSON moved to strike out this article.

Mr. VARNUM desired, before the question was put, to be indulged with an opportunity of reading the article at present in force, which would show that in principle it was the same with that in the bill.

H. OF R.

Louisiana Territory.

MARCH, 1804.

Mr. V. read the old article, which was found to correspond in principle with the article under consideration, the only variation arising from the old provision applying to the "Congress of the United States and the State Legislatures." Why gentlemen should now be inclined to leaving the Army loose to calumniate the Government, he could not say.

Mr. NICHOLSON said it was not his wish to fence round the President, Vice President, and Congress, with a second seditious law. If the officers of the Army conduct themselves improperly it is in the power of the Executive to punish them. They can be removed at the will of the President, or by a Court Martial. Besides, I do not understand the section. What is the meaning of "traitorous words," used against the President, Vice President, and Congress. I know of no traitorous words that can be so used. There are none such to be found in the Constitution.

The question was then taken on Mr. NICHOLSON's motion, and carried.

After some further consideration of the bill, the Committee rose, and the House, by a great majority, refused them leave to sit again.

GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the temporary government of Louisiana.

The substitute of Mr. EARLY, for the fourth section of the bill, was, with some verbal amendments, agreed to.

The bill was reported to the House, which proceeded to consider the said amendments at the Clerk's table; whereupon the first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, being to strike out the fourth section of the original bill, in the words following, to wit:

"SEC. 4. The Legislative powers shall be vested in the Governor, and in thirteen of the most fit and discreet persons of the Territory, to be called the Legislative Council, who shall be appointed annually by the President of the United States, from among those holding real estate therein, and who shall have resided one year at least in the said Territory, and hold no office of profit under the Territory, or the United States. The Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the said Legislative Council, or of a majority of them, shall have power to alter, modify, or repeal the laws which may be in force at the commencement of this act. Their Legislative powers shall also extend to all the rightful powers of legislation; but no law shall be valid, which is inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, or which shall lay any person under restraint, burden, or disability, on account of his religious opinions, professions, or worship; in all which he shall be free to maintain his own, and not be burdened for those of another. The Governor shall publish throughout the said Territory all the laws which shall be made, and shall, from time to time, report the same to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress; which, if disapproved of by Congress, shall thenceforth be of no force. The Governor, or Legislative Council, shall have no power over the primary disposal of the soil, nor to tax the lands of the United States, nor to interfere with the claims to lands within the said Territory. The Governor shall convene and prorogue the Legislative Council whenever he may deem it expedient. It shall be his duty to obtain all the information in his power in relation to the customs, habits, and dispositions of the inhabitants of the said Territory, and communicate the same from time to time to the President of the United States."

And to insert in lieu of the said fourth section a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 4. The Legislative powers shall be vested in the Governor, and in thirteen of the most fit and discreet persons of the Territory, to be called the Legislative Council, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States, from among those holding real estate therein, and who shall have resided one year at least in the said Territory, and hold no office of profit under the Territory, or the United States, to serve one year from the time of their appointment: And the said Legislative Council shall, at their first session, lay off or divide the said Territory into convenient counties or districts, and apportion among the said counties, or districts, according to their respective numbers, the thirteen members of the said Legislative Council: the members of the Legislative Council shall, after the expiration of one year from the time of the apportionment aforesaid, be chosen annually by all the free white male persons of the age of twenty-one years, who were resident in said Territory on the 30th day of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, and who had been resident therein one whole year next before the election, on their producing satisfactory proof to the officers of the election that they have taken an oath of allegiance to the United States, agreeably to an act of Congress passed on the fourteenth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and two, entitled 'An act to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject;' and by citizens of the United States, who may, since that time, have become residents in said Territory, or who may hereafter become residents, and who shall have resided therein one whole year, six months of that time next before the election, to be in the district or county in which he or they shall vote; and the Legislative Council so chosen as aforesaid, shall have power to fix the times and places, and to determine the manner of holding the said elections, and to judge of the qualifications of the members, and the validity of their elections. But if any of the said districts or counties shall refuse or neglect to make such election for one month after the time appointed for holding the same then the Governor, with the Council, shall appoint a person or persons, who shall reside within the district, and be qualified as aforesaid, to serve for the district or county so neglecting or refusing. The Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Council, or a majority of them, shall have power to alter, modify, or repeal the laws which may be in force at the commencement of this act. Their Legislative powers shall also extend to all the rightful objects of legislation; but no law shall be valid which is inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, or which shall lay any person under restraint, burden, or disability, on account of his religious opinions, professions, or worship; in all which he shall be free to maintain his own, and not be burdened for those of another. The Governor shall publish throughout the said Territory all the laws which shall be made; and shall, from time to time, report the same to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress, which, if disapproved by Congress, shall thenceforth be of no force. The Governor or Legislative Council shall have no power over the primary disposal of the soil, nor tax the lands of the United States, nor to interfere with the claims to land within the said Territory. The Governor shall convene and prorogue the Legislative Council whenever he may deem it expedient. It shall be his duty to obtain all the information in his power in relation to the customs, habits, and dispositions, of the inhabitants of the said Territory, and communicate the same, from time to time, to the President of the United States."

A division of the question on the said first amendment was called for, and, on the question that the House do agree to strike out the said fourth section of the original bill, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 23, as follows:

GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported yesterday from the Committee of the whole House to the bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof." Whereupon,

The third amendment, offered by Mr. RHEA, being under consideration, to insert after the words, "And be it further enacted," in the first line of the fourteenth section of the original bill, the words following, to wit:

SATURDAY, March 17.

Mr. SAMUEL L. MITCHILL, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill relative to the compensation of certain officers of the customs, and to provide for appointing surveyors in the districts therein mentioned; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. GEORGE W. CAMPBELL, from the committee appointed on the twenty-third of January last, presented a bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be authorized to continue the services of a third engrossing clerk in his office, from the first day of the present session until the further order of the House.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide by law for exhibiting and registering, in proper offices, and in the language used in the United States, and prior to the — day of —, in the year —, all evidences of title and claims for land within the territories ceded by the French Republic to the United States, by the Treaty of the thirtieth of April, in the year 1803, which have originated by virtue of any legal grant made by the French Government, prior to the Treaty of Paris, of the tenth day of February, in the year 1763, or of any legal grant made by the Government of Spain subsequent to the convention made by and between the French Government and the Government of Spain, of the third of November, 1762, and prior to the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, of the first of October, 1800; or of any legal grant made by the British Government subsequent to the said Treaty of Paris, of the tenth of February, in the year 1763, and prior to the Treaty of Peace, of the third of September, 1783.

The House proceeded to the farther consideration of the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels," which was amended and ordered to lie on the table on the fifteenth instant; and the said bill being further amended at the Clerk's table, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

The bill erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof, was read the third time.

Mr. DAWSON moved a recommitment of the bill for amendment.

Mr. ALSTON was against a general recommitment of the bill, but friendly to a recommitment for the purpose of limiting its duration.

Messrs. NICHOLSON, SMILIE, EARLY, and S. L. MITCHILL, opposed the recommitment.

Mr. BEDINGER advocated the recommitment.

The motion to recommit was then negatived—ayes 39, noes 43.

Mr. ALSTON said, if there was no objection, he would move the insertion of a clause to limit the period of the bill, on account principally of the great powers conferred on the Executive.

This motion being objected to, by Mr. LYON, was declared out of order.

The question was then put on the passage of the bill.

Messrs. LYON, SLOAN, JACKSON, and BEDINGER opposed, and Mr. SMILIE supported its passage.

Mr. VARNUM moved to recommit, for amendment, that part of the bill that vests equity powers in the courts of Louisiana.

Motion negatived—ayes 39, noes 44.

A motion was made to recommit the fourth section; which was lost—ayes 15.

Mr. BEDINGER moved to recommit the last section for the purpose of obtaining a limitation to the act.

Motion carried—ayes 52.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the last section.

When Mr. NICHOLSON moved an amendment limiting the act to two years and to the end of the next session thereafter.

Mr. BEDINGER said he would like its limitation to one year better, but would, if it were the sense of the House, be satisfied with two years.

Mr. NICHOLSON's motion was agreed to without a division.

The House agreed to the amendment; when the final question was put on the passage of the bill, and carried in the affirmative by yeas and nays—yeas 66, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, junior, Isaac Anderson, David Bard, George Michael Bedinger, Walter Bowie, Adam Boyd, John Boyle, Robert Brown, Levi Casey, Thomas Claiborne, Joseph Clay, Frederick Conrad, Jacob Crowninshield, Richard Cutts, William Dickson, John B. #### TERRITORY OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DAWSON moved the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is expedient for Congress to cede to the State of Virginia the jurisdiction of that part of the Territory of Columbia which was ceded to the United States by the said State of Virginia, by an act, passed the third day of December, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, entitled "An act for the cession of ten miles square, or any lesser quantity of territory, within this State, to the United States in Congress assembled, for the permanent seat of the General Government:" provided that the said State of Virginia shall consent and agree thereto.

Resolved, That it is expedient for Congress to cede to the State of Maryland the jurisdiction of that part of the Territory of Columbia, without the limits of the City of Washington, which was ceded to the United States by the said State of Maryland, by an act, passed the nineteenth day of December, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, entitled "An act concerning the Territory of Columbia and the City of Washington:" provided the said State of Maryland shall consent and agree thereto.

On referring the resolutions to a Committee of the Whole, the House divided—ayes 40, noes 28. There not being a quorum, a motion was made to adjourn, and lost—ayes 31.

The question was then put on considering the resolutions—ayes 36, noes 32.

There being no quorum, the motion to adjourn was repeated, and carried—ayes 45, noes 24.

MONDAY, March 19.

An engrossed bill to amend the act, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels," was read the third time, and passed.

Two petitions of sundry relatives and friends of the officers and others serving on board the United States' frigate Philadelphia, and of sundry other inhabitants of the City of Philadelphia, were presented to the House and read, respectively praying that the Government of the United States will be pleased to take such measures as may be deemed effectual and proper to rescue, from the deplorable state of slavery, the officers and crew of the said frigate Philadelphia, who are stated by the petitioners to have been lately captured near the coast of Tripoli.

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Resolved, That there be a call of the House to-day at two o'clock, post meridian.

Mr. DAWSON's motion to cede the Territory of Columbia, with the exception of the City of Washington, was referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of the late General Moses Hazen; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the public lands south of the State of Tennessee;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Pursuant to the order of this day, the Clerk proceeded to a call of this House; and ninety-six members (including the Speaker) appeared in their places.

The absentees being then called over and noted, it appeared that forty-four members were absent; twenty-four of whom have obtained leave; one has not appeared in his seat during the session; and nineteen, for whom no excuses or insufficient excuses were made, failed to be present at the call.

The last mentioned absentees appearing immediately after the call, were, on a motion made and seconded, ordered to be severally excused.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads, and for other purposes," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments of the Senate: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said amendments, together with the bill, be committed to Mr. THOMAS, Mr. SANFORD, Mr. HANNA, Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. STANFORD.

The House proceeded to the further consideration of the bill to extend the time for making the oath required in case of goods, wares, and merchandise, exported and entitled to drawback, and therein to amend the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," which was amended by the House on the fourth of January last: Whereupon, a motion was made and seconded further to amend the said bill; and, on the question that the House do agree to the further amendment proposed thereto, it passed in the negative.

And then the question being put that the said bill, with the amendment agreed to, be engrossed for a third reading, it passed in the negative. So the bill was rejected.

TUESDAY, March 20.

Resolved, That there be a call of the House every day, at half past ten o'clock, during the remainder of the session.

The order of the day for the House to resolve into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the Militia of the District of Columbia," being called for, a motion was made, and the question being put, that the said order of the day be postponed until the first Monday in December next, it was resolved in the affirmative.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the legal representatives of the late General Moses Hazen was read the third time, and passed.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating a letter received from Captain Bainbridge, commander of the Philadelphia frigate, informing of the wreck of that vessel on the coast of Tripoli, and that himself, his officers, and men, had fallen into the hands of the Tripolitans.

The Message and the documents accompanying the same were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate agree to the seventh amendment proposed by the House to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary Government thereof;" also, to the eighth amendment, with an amendment thereto; to which they desire the concurrence of this House; and disagree to all the other amendments of this House to the said bill. The Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to erect a light-house at the mouth of the Mississippi river; and, also, a light-house at or near the pitch of Cape Lookout, in the State of North Carolina; and a beacon at the North point of Sandy Hook;" also, a bill entitled "An act for the relief of William A. Barron; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for imposing more specific duties on the importation of certain articles; and, also, for levying and collecting light-house money on foreign ships or vessels; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Mr. DANA moved to amend the said bill, by inserting after the fifth section, a new section, proposed to be the sixth section of the bill, in the words following, to wit:

"And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of June next, the bonds to be given for securing the payment of the duties arising on spirits imported from the West Indies, shall be made payable, the one half in six, and the other half in nine calendar months from the date of each respective importation."

And on the question that the House do agree to the said amendment, it passed in the negative—yeas 38, nays 73, as follows:

The absentees were then again called over and noted, and the door shut: after which it appeared that there were eleven members for whom no excuses or insufficient excuses were made, but who were then attending at the door to be admitted: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said absentees, be severally excused.

On a motion made and seconded,

Ordered, That the resolution of the twentieth instant, for a call of the House every day, at half past ten o'clock, during the remainder of the session, be rescinded.

Mr. THOMAS, from the committee to whom was referred the amendments of the Senate to the post office bill, reported that it was expedient to agree to the same, with the exception of one amendment.

The House concurred in the report, and agreed to all the amendments but one, which authorizes a new route to New Orleans, to which they disagreed.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of William A. Barron," was read twice and committed to Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, and Mr. S. L. MITCHILL.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to erect a light-house at the mouth of the Mississippi river, and also a light-house at or near the pitch of Cape Lookout, in the State of North Carolina, and a beacon at the point of Sandy Hook," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

A bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to make further appropriations for the purpose of extinguishing the Indian claims," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to repeal part of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen;" and after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers.

[The bill provides that an additional duty of two and a half per centum be laid upon all imported goods at present charged with a duty ad valorem, and an additional duty of ten per cent. on all such duties payable on goods imported in foreign vessels. The proceeds of these duties are to constitute a fund, to be called the Mediterranean fund. The duties to cease within three months after a peace with Tripoli, in case the United States are not engaged in war with some other of the Barbary Powers, in which case they are to cease within three months after a peace with such Powers. The President is authorized to cause to be purchased or built two vessels of war, to carry sixteen guns each, and as many gun-boats as he may think proper. One million of dollars, additional to the sum heretofore appropriated, is placed under the direction of the President for the naval service, which sum he is authorized to borrow at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent.]

Mr. NICHOLSON moved that this bill should be made the order for this day—

Mr. R. GRISWOLD moved to-morrow.

The question on "to-morrow" was lost—yeas 33, nays 50; when Mr. NICHOLSON's motion prevailed.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The bill laying more specific duties on certain articles, and imposing light-money on foreign vessels entering the ports of the United States, was read the third time.

Mr. HUGER moved its postponement to the first Monday of December, under the impression that its merits, and the principles it contained, had not received that full and deliberate examination to which they were entitled.

Mr. J. CLAY observed that a postponement would be virtually a rejection of the bill.

Mr. MITCHILL concisely advocated the principles of the bill.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE also defended it.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD opposed it, principally on the ground that it increased the existing rate of duties.

Mr. J. CLAY replied; and allowed that the duties imposed by the bill would produce more revenue than that heretofore received, but contended that this would arise from the fraudulent practice heretofore in use of making out invoices of articles subject at present to ad valorem duties. In removing this evil the necessary effect would be an increase of revenue, not exceeding, however, the probable receipt in case the invoices were fairly made out.

Mr. HUGER followed, in a speech of considerable length, in which he contended that the operation of the bill would be to promote the manufactures of the Eastern and Middle States, to the great detriment of the Southern States. Principally, though not entirely on this ground, he declared himself hostile to the bill.

After a few remarks from Mr. BOYD in defence, and of Mr. CLAIBORNE against the bill, the question of postponement was taken by yeas and nays and lost—yeas 40, nays 68, as follows:

GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

The House took up the message of the Senate on the amendments of the House to the Louisiana bill, which represents the disagreement of the Senate to all the proposed amendments excepting two.

The amendments were taken up in the order of succession.

1st. The message stated the disagreement of the Senate to striking out the fourth section of the original bill, and to the substitution of another section.

On receding from this amendment, the House divided by yeas and nays—yeas 37, nays 63, as follows:

THURSDAY, March 22.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their sixteenth amendment, disagreed to by this House, to add to the first of two new sections after the third section of the bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads, and for other purposes," and desire a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the said amendment; to which conference the Senate have appointed managers on their part. The Senate agree to all the amendments proposed by this House to the other amendments of the Senate to the said bill. The Senate have also agreed to the conference desired by this House on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof," and have appointed managers at the said conference on their part.

The House proceeded to consider so much of the foregoing message of the Senate as relates to the bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads, and for other purposes:" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth insist on their disagreement to the sixteenth amendment insisted on by the Senate to the said bill.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the conference desired by the Senate on the subject-matter of the said amendment; and that Mr. VARNUM, Mr. R. GRISWOLD, and Mr. THOMAS, be appointed managers at the same, on the part of this House.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting the last returns of the militia of the United States. The Message, and the returns of the militia transmitted therewith, were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill to repeal a part of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls; and for the further protection of American seamen," was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to ascertain the boundary of the lands reserved for the State of Virginia northwest of the Ohio river, for the satisfaction of her officers and soldiers on Continental Establishment, and to limit the period for locating the said land;" and after some time spent therein, the bill was reported without amendment. The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend the laws providing for the organization of the accounting offices of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments;" also, a bill, entitled "An act giving additional compensation to the Governor, Secretary, and Judges, of the Indiana Territory;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the laws providing for the organization of the accounting offices of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act giving additional compensation to the Governor, Secretary, and Judges, of the Indiana Territory," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, who were instructed by a resolution of this House, of the thirtieth ultimo, "to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the office of Accountant of the Navy Department, and the office of the Accountant of the War Department," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was this day committed the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the laws providing for the organization of the accounting offices of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments."

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill relative to the compensations of certain officers of the customs, and to provide for appointing surveyors in the districts therein mentioned; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the public lands south of the State of Tennessee;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the committee to whom were referred, on the first instant, a letter from the Postmaster General, and sundry books or statements, marked A, B, C, and D, in relation to "the amount of postage in each State, for three successive years, commencing the first of October, 1800, and ending the thirtieth of September, 1803; also, to the amount of commissions of postmasters; to the expenses of transporting the mails on all roads in each State; and to other expenses of the post offices;" made a report: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said letter, together with the summary report or statement, marked D, which accompanied the same, be printed for the use of the members of both Houses of Congress.

ADDITIONAL DUTIES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to strike out the first section, which is as follows:

"Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of equipping, officering, manning, and employing such of the armed vessels of the United States, as may be deemed requisite by the President of the United States, for protecting the commerce and seamen thereof, and for carrying on warlike operations against the Regency of Tripoli, or any other of the Barbary Powers, which may commit hostilities against the United States, and for the purpose also of defraying any other expenses incidental to the intercourse with the Barbary Powers, or which are authorized by this act, a duty of two and a half per centum ad valorem, in addition to the duties now imposed by law, shall be laid, levied, and collected upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, paying a duty ad valorem, which shall, after the thirtieth day of June next, be imported into the United States from any foreign port or place; and an addition of ten per centum shall be made to the said additional duty in respect to all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported in ships or vessels not of the United States, and the duties imposed by this act shall be levied and collected in the same manner, and under the same regulations and allowances, as to drawbacks, mode of security, and time of payment, respectively, as are already prescribed by law, in relation to the duties now in force on the articles on which the said additional duty is laid by this act."

Mr. G. said, that it was much to be regretted that gentlemen had thought proper, upon this occasion, to connect with the great and ostensible object of the bill, any provisions which should produce a disunion in the House. The unfortunate event in the Mediterranean called loudly for vigorous and decisive measures, and he trusted there would not exist on the floor a difference of opinion on that point. For himself, he was disposed to clothe the President with all the power, and to furnish him with all the means which were necessary to bring the war with Tripoli to a successful and speedy termination. And when this was done, to make him, as he ought to be, responsible for the event.

It is always improper, said Mr. G., to connect in the same bill two subjects which are in their natures distinct; and much more improper upon this occasion, to tack to the provisions for the Mediterranean service, upon which there could be no difference of opinion, a new tax, in respect to which gentlemen could not agree.

The first section of the bill, which he had moved to strike out, imposed a new tax of two and a half per centum ad valorem on all goods now liable by law to an ad valorem duty. Goods paying at this time an ad valorem duty were divided into three classes—the first class was liable to a duty of twelve and a half per cent.; the second, to a duty of fifteen per cent.; and the third, to a duty of twenty per cent.

The addition of two and a half per cent. now proposed, would increase the duties to fifteen, seventeen and a half, and twenty-two and a half per cent., when the goods were imported in American bottoms; and if they were imported in foreign bottoms, the duties would be further increased, by the addition of ten per cent.

This view of the import, said Mr. G., will satisfy gentlemen that the duties are already high, and that the proposed addition will render them enormous. This step, therefore, ought not to be hazarded, unless the necessities of the Government are absolutely imperious, and no other means can be resorted to for obtaining the money.

There is a point, in imposing duties, beyond which it is not safe or prudent to go, and it becomes gentlemen seriously to consider whether we have not already reached that point. The whole revenue of the United States is at this time collected from commerce. Every other branch of business has been exempted from immediate taxes. The impost has been collected hitherto without much complaint, and with much punctuality; but this has been owing to the honor and integrity of the merchants. The facility of smuggling is great and extensive in this country. The extent of our coast, the innumerable inlets which are found upon it, and the small number of revenue cutters employed, renders it easy to smuggle goods, for those who are disposed to evade the laws.

Fortunately, however, it has been, and still is, disgraceful to engage in this business. But if new impositions are laid on commerce—if trade is made the pack-horse, to carry all the burdens of Government, no man can say how soon it will become fashionable to evade the laws. The merchant, soured by new burdens, and the short credit which is allowed him at the custom-houses, will begin to think it no disgrace to evade the laws and to save his money. He will soon believe that the Government which pays no respect to him, is not entitled to his support. It is easy to foresee what the effect must be, when a spirit of this kind prevails among those who are engaged in commerce. It is well known that the hazard of seizure is by no means equal to the duties, and when men no longer feel themselves bound in honor to pay the duties, will they be paid?

These considerations, said Mr. G., have induced me to reprobate the impolicy of laying all our burdens on commerce, and induced me to consider it unwise to touch the subject, but with the utmost delicacy.

The question then returns upon us, said Mr. G.: Are the necessities of the Government so imperious as to demand this great and extraordinary imposition?

We have not, said Mr. G., received from the Executive departments any estimate of the extraordinary force, or the supply necessary for this service—we are left entirely in the dark upon these important points. Having no connexion with the Executive departments, he had thought it his duty, yesterday, to inquire at the navy yard what ships had been ordered on this occasion for the Mediterranean, and, to his astonishment, he understood that two frigates only had been ordered to be got in readiness. He hoped the account he had received was incorrect, and trusted that some gentleman connected with the Executive, would inform the House what force was in contemplation.

Be the force however, said Mr. G., what it may, there can be no necessity at this time for a new tax. We have heard much for three years, about the wealth of the Treasury, the increase of revenue, and the economy of the Administration. And yet we are now told that the loss of a frigate, and a petty war with pirates, renders a new and large tax necessary.

But it may be proper to go into some detail. He was ignorant, as he had already observed, of the force contemplated by the Administration, but it would appear that the probable force could not require the new tax. Taking the estimate of the last year to ascertain the annual expense of ships on the Mediterranean station, it would appear—

Mr. G. said that he did not pretend to state that the force which he had stated was all that was necessary for the service. But a reinforcement of four frigates and two brigs, in addition to the force already in those seas, would cost the Government, if we followed the estimates of the Secretary of the Navy, only $389,505 25 per annum, and if the extra force employed was much more considerable, still the expense would not arise so high as to require any new taxes.

The Treasury account, said Mr. G., of the last year stated that there was in the Treasury, on the first day of October, 1803, in specie, $5,860,981 54. This sum he knew was charged with one or two instalments of the debt falling due under the British Convention, and with two millions, being a part of the $3,750,000 stipulated under the French Convention, to be paid to the merchants.

But, after deducting those sums, there would still remain a sufficient balance for the present emergency. And unless the public had been deceived by those flattering representations which had been given of the Treasury operations, it was apparent that the Government could not want any new taxes.

The proposed tax, if fairly collected, would produce at least $750,000 per annum. This result might be seen from a view of the imports into the United States of goods now liable to an ad valorem duty. From the last official report, it appeared that the importation of goods of that description, amounted in that year to about forty millions of dollars—the two and a half per cent. on the whole sum would, of course, produce one million, but, allowing for the drawback of duties on goods exported, the net revenue could not be less than $750,000. Why, then, impose a tax of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars to meet an expenditure which will not probably exceed four or five hundred thousand dollars?

The second section of the bill, said Mr. G., is not immediately under consideration, but he was obliged to refer to it for the purpose of explaining his objections to the first section. That section declared that the money arising from the new tax should constitute a distinct fund, under the denomination of the Mediterranean fund, and should be applied exclusively to the objects contemplated by the bill. This was a popular and a plausible provision, but it was perfectly deceptive, and in truth amounted to nothing. Those who gave the bill a cursory reading, would be led to suppose that the money arising from the tax could only be applied to the extra expense to be incurred in the Mediterranean; but this would not be the case. The money might be expended on every object connected with the Mediterranean service, and, as the navy of the United States was only employed in those seas, the consequence would be, that the money would be expended on the navy generally. And in fact the new tax would produce a fund for supporting the Naval Establishment, and if the expense of that establishment did not greatly exceed the items which he had already stated, the new tax would nearly cover the whole expense of the navy, and, during the war with Tripoli, liberate the ordinary revenue from that branch of expense altogether. This, said Mr. G., looks too much like an attempt, on the part of the Administration, to avail itself of a public misfortune to impose new, impolitic, and unnecessary taxes, for the purpose of replenishing the Treasury, for purposes very different from those held out by the bill.

Mr. G. concluded by saying, that he would again express his regret that gentlemen had, in this unusual manner, connected two distinct subjects in the same bill, and in that manner destroyed the unanimity which would otherwise have prevailed in the House. He hoped a majority would consent to separate them, and agree to the motion for striking out.

Mr. NICHOLSON regretted that it was not in his power to furnish the information desired by the gentleman from Connecticut. Had he been solicitous to learn the extent of the armament about to be fitted out, he would not have gone to the navy yard for information, but to a higher authority, equally accessible to the gentleman as to himself. He had not himself sought this information, because he knew that the President, having confided to him a discretionary power as to the armed force of the nation, would use it in such a manner as would be most effectual. His only object, therefore, was to give him the power of using the means of the United States with energy; leaving the discretion in him, as it necessarily must be, to use it as he should think proper. If we were about to raise an army to commence hostilities against a foreign nation, it would not be the province of the House to inquire how it should be directed. Having authorized the raising and equipping it, it would forthwith come solely under the power of the Executive department—our power being confined to supplying the means by which it may be raised.

In introducing this bill, Mr. N. said, he had thought it proper, when the Government were about to incur a very heavy expense, that means should be provided by which it should be defrayed. The gentleman from Connecticut, who has moved to strike out this section, seems extremely willing to incur the expense, on condition that no means shall be provided by which it shall be defrayed. Mr. N. said he held it a sound doctrine in politics, and more particularly applicable to a Government like ours, when provision was made for incurring expenses, to provide likewise the means of meeting them. This was a doctrine by which the Legislature ought to be governed. They ought not to authorize any expense, without at the same time providing the means, unless on great emergencies when the means are not in their power. There may be such emergencies, when it is proper to authorize the Executive to loan considerable sums; when no other means can be resorted to by the Government.

We are now about to authorize a greater expense than usual, and the Legislature are called upon to provide means for its discharge. For one, said Mr. N., I can never consent to add to the public debt, while the resources of the country are adequate to its wants. These are my ideas; and I feel somewhat surprised at the calculation of the gentleman from Connecticut, on the expense about to be incurred. He estimates this expense at $388,000; though yesterday when this subject was laid before the Committee of Ways and Means, and it was contemplated to provide $750,000, he moved to strike out $750,000, and insert $1,000,000. And yet he now tells us that only $388,000 are required. As to the specie in the Treasury, the gentleman states that on the 1st of October there were $5,000,000. But with what disbursements is this chargeable? Out of it there are to be paid American citizens for French spoiliations the sum of $3,750,000 in cash, which must remain in the Treasury, that just claims may be paid as soon as presented. Under the British Convention there is to be paid $800,000; and there is likewise to be paid the interest on Louisiana stock, amounting to $685,000; the aggregate of which sums is $5,235,000. Not having made this calculation until the gentleman made his observation, it is possible it may not be perfectly correct.

When the loss of the Philadelphia was announced, my first inquiry of the Secretary of the Treasury was what money could be spared from the Treasury for the prosecution of vigorous measures. His answer was, that the greatest sum which could be spared would not exceed $150,000. I did not, like the gentleman, go to the clerks or to the navy yard; but I got the best information I could.

The gentleman from Connecticut, who appears willing to incur an expense of a million of dollars, while he is unwilling to provide the means of meeting it, objects to the mode of raising revenue proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, without proposing any other. He objects to the laying additional duties on imported goods. In his remarks he has made an erroneous statement of the quantity of goods on which ad valorem duties are paid. His error has arisen from not deducting the amount of drawbacks. By an official statement made this session, it will be found that during the year 1802, goods paying ad valorem duties were as follows:

Rate.	Amount.	Duty.
12½ per cent.	$23,377,717	$2,922,214
15 "	7,888,614	1,183,292
20 "	439,830	87,966

Amounting to $34,706,161 $4,193,472

The average duty on goods charged ad valorem is about thirteen and a half per cent. Let us consider the duties paid by other articles. The gentleman says in laying duties there is a point beyond which we cannot go in safety on account of the temptation to smuggling. This is true. But of all goods imported those chargeable with ad valorem duties are the most difficult to smuggle. The invoices are made out in the country from which they are imported. These must be authenticated, and presented at the custom-house and sworn to. If the collector has any reason to suspect that there are goods on board of a vessel, not in the entry, he is to make a thorough examination of the vessel. If he sees a bale in which he suspects there are goods not stated in the invoice, it is in his power to have it examined. I believe there is but little smuggling at this time; but that the articles on which there is most smuggling are rum and coffee. If the gentleman allows that the duty on articles charged specifically is not so high as to encourage smuggling to any great or dangerous extent, he will allow the same in the case of articles charged ad valorem. The great articles from which revenue are obtained, are Spirits, which pay an average duty of twenty-nine and two-tenths cents, and which produce $2,253,496, and cost the importer from twenty-five to fifty cents per gallon. Spirits which pay twenty-five cents a gallon do not cost the importer more than fifty cents, and consequently pay a duty of fifty per cent. on the price of the article. Spirits of the third proof pay twenty-eight cents, and do not cost more than fifty-six cents a gallon, which is equal to a duty of fifty per cent. So with spirits of higher proof. From this article is derived more than a fifth of our revenue, and yet I never heard the amount of the duty complained of until a few days since a petition was presented from the merchants of Connecticut. It is certain that Congress have never considered it so high as to encourage smuggling.

Of imported sugars 39,443,814 lbs. are consumed within the United States; which pay, on an average, a duty of two and a half cents per pound. The price of brown sugar to the importer is about five or six dollars the hundred. The duty is therefore between forty-five and fifty per cent. Is this duty considered so high as to encourage smuggling? If not, shall gentlemen complain when we are about to lay an additional duty of two and a half per cent. upon articles now chargeable with duties of from twelve and a half to twenty per cent?

Of salt there is consumed 3,244,309 bushels in the United States. It pays a duty of twenty cents a bushel. In many instances this is equal to the first cost; and amounts therefore to one hundred per cent.

The consumption of wines amounts to 1,912,274 gallons, and the average duty is thirty-three cents. The duty on Madeira wine is fifty-eight cents, and it costs the importer one dollar and twenty-five cents. The duty therefore amounts to near fifty per cent. If the cost be taken at one dollar and fifty cents the duty will be thirty-three and a third per cent. And yet it is not complained that it encourages smuggling.

Sherry and St. Lucar pay forty cents per gallon, and the original cost is not more than sixty-six cents. The duty bears the same proportion in the case of Lisbon.

Taking the average duty on wines we find it is from thirty-three to fifty per cent; and yet gentlemen say if the duty on articles chargeable ad valorem be raised from twelve and a half to fifteen per cent. it will encourage smuggling.

Teas produce $382,669. Bohea tea pays a duty of at least one hundred per cent., and Souchong, Hyson, and other teas, pay in the same proportion.

Thus it appears that articles of great consumption, and many of them of almost indispensable necessity, pay a duty of fifty to one hundred per cent., and yet gentlemen are unwilling to lay an additional duty of two and a half per cent. on articles now paying duties of twelve and a half and fifteen per cent. As to those charged with twenty per cent. they are not worth considering, as the whole duties on them only amount to $87,966, and as they are in themselves unimportant.

I have heard an idea thrown out, that instead of laying a duty on articles now charged with ad valorem duties, it would be more advisable to lay a specific duty upon all imported goods. I think I have shown that this would be unjust, and that the articles which at present pay specific duties are charged relatively sufficiently high. I believe if the emergencies of the country required it we might, without disturbing the proper proportion, lay an additional duty of from ten to fifteen per cent. on goods charged ad valorem, and without the increase being felt by the country, or its producing smuggling. At present it is only contemplated to raise them two and a half per cent.

I repeat it, that I consider it the duty of the Legislature, when they authorize extraordinary expenditures, to provide, so far as it is in their power, extraordinary means; for I believe we have no right to burden posterity with taxes which we dare not ourselves meet. The protection now asked for our trade is for our own benefit; we ought not, therefore, to shrink from the burden it necessarily creates. This is the reason why I advocate this additional duty of two and a half per cent., and because I believe trade will bear it, and because I do not think it will be felt by a man in the country. What will be the effect of the additional duty? The greater part of goods charged ad valorem are woollens, linens, manufactures of steel, brass, and articles of a similar kind, and muslins. In a muslin gown the additional duty will make a difference of about five cents. India muslins cost about fifteen cents a yard, and English about twenty-five cents. The additional duty will therefore be about three-eighths of a cent on India, and about three-fourths of a cent on English muslins. This I consider a burden which no one can feel. The additional duty on linens will be equally unfelt. In a bale of osnaburges, which costs twenty cents, the additional duty on a hundred yards will not exceed fifty cents. So as to Irish linens and woollens. The difference in a coarse suit of clothes for a common man will not be more than twenty-five cents, and that of a better kind will not exceed one dollar and twenty-five cents. I am surprised, after taking this view of the operation of the proposed duty, that gentlemen should dwell upon the great burden it will impose, when it can, in truth, scarcely be felt by the poorest man in the country. It is indeed of no consideration but on account of the money raised by it, which I have estimated at about $750,000.

The gentleman from Connecticut thinks he has discovered in the second section a design that is not avowed, to wit: to liberate the present resources from their application to the support of the Navy. I wonder, however, that the gentleman, before he made this unguarded remark, did not read the section through. He would then have seen that the fund established by this act is to exist no longer than three months after the discontinuance of war in the Mediterranean. Nor is it true that the whole expenses of the Navy are in the Mediterranean. It is true, that at this time they are principally there. But there is likewise considerable expense incurred here in the navy yard on the ships, and on the half-pay of officers not in actual service. Whence the gentleman deduces the inference, when the bill itself declares that the new duties shall cease three months after the end of the war, I am altogether at a loss to comprehend. The duties are to cease with the occasion which produced them. When we shall no longer be at war, the war duties will be at an end.

I had hoped that on an occasion like this, there would not have been a dissenting voice on this floor on measures for protecting the trade and supporting the character of the nation. But, I find that all hope of this kind is vain, and that every measure proposed, however necessary, will be opposed. I can only say that I regret it, and more particularly on this occasion, when our constituents have a right to expect perfect unanimity.

MR. DANA.—The gentleman from Maryland must surely have committed a mistake, when he said that there is no measure proposed on his side of the House which does not meet with opposition. When the President considered vigorous measures necessary against the Emperor of Morocco, the Journal will show that we entered into them unanimously. Nor is the objection now urged in any way an objection to the general measure contemplated. The only objection, is to the imposition of unnecessary taxes. If the force necessary to be sent into the Mediterranean will not exceed an expense of $380,000, the necessity for the imposition of the proposed taxes surely does not exist. I admit that, after the force is raised, the President, in virtue of his authority as Commander-in-chief, is to have its whole direction; but it is perfectly novel to me to learn that we are not previously to be informed of the extent to which it is proposed to carry it. If to the present number of vessels in service we add two frigates and five smaller vessels, they will require only an additional appropriation of $354,000. This, I believe, is the full extent of the additional force contemplated. As to raising money to that amount I make no objection. Though I dislike laying duties thus in gross, yet I do not know that there can be any great objection to it. The sum proposed to be raised will give $750,000, which is more than double the sum necessary.

Is it proper thus to raise these duties, and hold forth to the nation that the commerce of the Mediterranean is so expensive? The late disaster in the Mediterranean is not of itself an adequate cause for the measure. I object to this measure, because it goes to give an improper impression of the causes of the bill.

Formerly, this way of raising revenue was arraigned as a deceptive mode of drawing money from the people. Now we find no murmur at extending it. Gentlemen may possibly be right when they say the country would not feel an additional duty of ten or fifteen per cent. I believe, however, they have not so much apathy as the remark implies.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD said he would not detain the Committee for many minutes. The gentleman from Maryland says that, in the select committee that introduced the bill, no estimate of expenses was considered necessary. The sum proposed to be appropriated, was $750,000. I, said Mr. G., proposed adding to it, stating the necessity of making the sum appropriated sufficient; and that if the whole was not wanted it could not be used. I was willing, therefore, to appropriate a million; and I am still of opinion that it is proper to vest the President with ample powers, and I will vote with great cordiality for appropriating a million, trusting, if the whole expense is not necessary, it will not be incurred.

The gentleman from Maryland finds fault with my being ready to incur the expense, but not to provide the means for meeting it. If the new taxes were necessary I would vote for them, much as I dislike the mode. Gentlemen will, I hope, have the candor to believe us sincere, when they recollect that I opposed the repeal of the internal taxes. I thought then that it was not politic to load commerce with the whole burdens of the nation—I think so still.

By the last Treasury report, there appears to have been in the Treasury	-	-	-	$5,560,000

-----------------------	---	---	---	-------------

I am sensible that there is some charge for the new debt contracted for Louisiana; but if we advert to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, we will find he has not so estimated it. He states a surplus of $200,000 of net revenue. He considers the interest of the Louisiana stock as chargeable upon the net revenue and not on the specie balance in the Treasury; for, as the interest accrues annually, the specie balance would soon be exhausted. I am sensible that it is difficult, from any documents on the table, to be perfectly correct. Had the gentleman distinctly attended to my estimate of the avails of the proposed additional duties, he would have seen that it was not incorrect. I took the gross amount of goods chargeable ad valorem at forty millions, and estimated that two and a half per cent. duty thereon would produce a million; making twenty-five per cent. allowance for drawbacks, I made it produce the net sum of $750,000.

Mr. G. concluded, by observing that the Committee must be sensible, by adverting to the act, that the proposed fund would not be confined to the Mediterranean. The second section is as follows:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That a distinct account shall be kept of the duties imposed by this act, and the proceeds thereof shall constitute a fund, to be denominated 'the Mediterranean Fund,' and shall be applied solely to the purposes designated by this act; and the said additional duty shall cease and be discontinued at the expiration of three months after the ratification by the President of the United States of a Treaty of Peace with the Regency of Tripoli, unless the United States should then be at war with any other of the Barbary Powers, in which case the said additional duty shall cease and be discontinued at the expiration of three months after the ratification by the President of the United States of a Treaty of Peace with such Power: Provided, however, That the said additional duty shall be collected on all such goods, wares, and merchandise, liable to pay the same, as shall have been imported previous to the day on which the duty is to cease."

The object is general, and gentlemen must be sensible, if the money collected is sufficient to discharge the expense of the Navy, it may be so applied. It must, indeed, be applied to that object, as none other is stated.

Mr. NICHOLSON said, the gentleman from Connecticut seemed to consider the object too general; he would, in case the Committee refused to strike out the first section, move to limit the application of the fund "to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States in the Mediterranean."

The question was then taken on striking out the first section, and passed in the negative—ayes 26.

Mr. N. then offered the amendment just stated.

Mr. EVSTIS hoped the gentleman from Maryland would withdraw his amendment, as in a subsequent part of the bill the object is distinctly specified. It is altogether unnecessary; and if agreed to, it will be necessary to add, "or adjacent seas."

Mr. NICHOLSON said, he considered the amendment as unnecessary; but as he had promised to make it, he could not withdraw it.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said he would suggest one reason why it ought not to obtain. One of the Barbary Powers possessed a coast out of the Mediterranean. If the misfortune of the United States should dispose this Power, (Morocco,) already predisposed to hostility, to war upon the United States, it would not be in our power to block up the port of Salée, and several other ports out of the Mediterranean.

The question was taken on the amendment, which was lost without a division.

H. OF R.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill without amendment.

The House immediately took it up—when Mr. R. GRISWOLD renewed his motion to strike out the first section.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said that, on his return yesterday to his seat after an indispensable absence during last week, he had learned with as much surprise as concern the disastrous event which had given rise to the bill then before them. Not being present when the bill originated in the Committee of Ways and Means, it could not be expected that he should go largely into detail; and even if he had been prepared so to do, the very satisfactory statement of his friend from Maryland (Mr. NICHOLSON) rendered it altogether unnecessary. He should content himself with offering some few remarks, by way of reply, to the objections of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD.) These resolved themselves into two distinct branches—first, to the raising of any additional revenue whatever; secondly, to the proposed mode of obtaining it.

On the first of these points, Mr. R. begged leave to refer to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, laid before the House early in the present session.

He there computes the permanent annual revenue of the United States at - - - $10,400,000
And the permanent annual expense, viz: sinking fund, civil list, foreign intercourse, military and Indian, naval departments, on the existing establishment, is estimated at - 9,800,000

Leaving a surplus of revenue equal to - - - - - $600,000

How these six hundred thousand dollars are to be disposed of will be seen hereafter. So much, sir, for our permanent revenue, and our permanent expenditure.

The extraordinary resources, consisting of specie in the Treasury and arrears of old taxes, amount to $6,660,000; and this is the fund from which the gentleman from Connecticut boldly asserts we may defray the expense of the projected armament. But it will be observed that these extraordinary resources, ample as they are, are charged, as the gentleman himself well knows, with very heavy extraordinary demands. These, on account of our Convention with Great Britain, expenses in relation to it, and to the Convention with France, a loan due the State of Maryland, and two millions for the purchase of Louisiana, amount, altogether to $4,964,000, which, being deducted from the preceding sum of $6,660,000, will leave only $1,696,000; beyond which the Secretary is of opinion it would not be prudent to reduce the specie in the Treasury.

But it is to be remembered that the purchase of Louisiana has created an additional debt of fifteen millions—$11,250,000 of six per cent. stock transferred to the French Government, and $3,750,000 payable in specie, during the present year, to American citizens having claims for spoiliations against that Government. For discharging this last demand, however, two millions are reserved out of the extraordinary resources, as has just been stated, leaving a balance, on this account, of $1,750,000, and reducing the whole amount of debt to be otherwise provided for, on account of Louisiana, to thirteen millions. And here permit me to remark, that, granting, for argument's sake, there was no necessity to retain a dollar in the Treasury, the above balance of $1,750,000 would, of itself, be more than sufficient to absorb all that remained of our extraordinary resources, after defraying the extraordinary demands which I have enumerated. So sensible, however, have we been of the danger of entirely emptying the Treasury, that we have made provision for funding this balance of $1,750,000, which will fall due this year, on account of American claims for spoiliations, as well as the $11,250,000 payable to France. These thirteen millions of new debt form no part of the preceding statements. Out of what funds, then, is the annual interest, amounting to $780,000, to be discharged? Certainly not out of the extraordinary resources, for these, after paying the extraordinary demands above stated, leave no greater surplus than it is necessary to keep in the Treasury; and, if the $1,600,000, the amount of that surplus, could be spared, the specie balance of American claims, unpaid, is more than sufficient to employ it. No, sir; the only fund relied upon to meet the interest of this additional debt, is the surplus of the permanent revenue beyond the permanent expense, (under the existing establishments,) to which I formerly adverted, amounting to $600,000, and, to supply the deficiency, the proceeds of the custom-house at New Orleans, taken at $200,000. These, and these only, are the means which can be relied on to meet this additional expense; and the House will perceive that the Secretary of the Treasury advances "with diffidence the opinion that it is possible thus to provide for the payment of the interest of a new debt of thirteen millions, without recurring to additional taxes."

Mr. R. said he trusted it had been satisfactorily shown that there was not one dollar, either of ordinary or extraordinary revenue, which the existing engagements of the Government would not require. This had been repeatedly stated on various other occasions. It had been made an objection to the Senate's proposition for building two small vessels of war. It was then said, if necessary, we are ready to incur the expense, but not unless gentlemen are ready to raise the supplies for meeting it. The gentleman from Connecticut is too liberal; he is willing to grant the Administration credit for more than they require or deserve. After having paid near ten millions of the principal of the public debt, being ready to disburse near five millions more, on account of the extraordinary demands before mentioned, and having provided as well for the final extinguishment by adding to the Sinking Fund, as for the interest of the debt incurred by the purchase of Louisiana, without levying a single additional tax, they are content to acknowledge that they do not possess resources for defraying the expense of an extraordinary armament in the Mediterranean. The gentleman from Connecticut, however, insists that, after defraying these heavy demands, there is a large surplus remaining, and is willing to vote a million for this service, without providing means to raise a dollar.

Having established, as he conceived, the main object for which he rose, that additional revenue would be required in case we launched into this new expense, it only remained to inquire to what subjects of taxation we should resort. This point, Mr. R. said, had been so ably and forcibly dilated on by his friend from Maryland, that it was hardly necessary to ask whether the House were prepared to increase the duties on tea, coffee, spirits, wines, sugar, salt, and other articles of great and primary importance—for such our habits had rendered those which were not actual necessities of life—already loaded with specific duties amounting from twenty-five to seventy-five per cent. on their prime cost, or whether we should raise the comparatively low duties on those articles which were taxed ad valorem.

The gentleman from Connecticut has indeed gently insinuated his recommendation that we should burn our fingers with that species of taxation with which he had formerly scorched his own. He is unwilling to throw the whole burden of the nation upon its commerce, as if the very children had not learned that every tax on imports is not paid by the consumer of the article in question; and as if the very revenue in question were not for the protection of trade. Here Mr. R. went into a comparison between the advantages of indirect and direct taxation, and concluded by observing that there were two insuperable reasons for preferring the former, that it was the only mode, in the present state of our society, by which the necessary revenue could be raised, and that by confining ourselves to it altogether, the number of officers employed in the collection of that revenue, was as much as possible restricted. The proposed duties would not give a single additional office, or add in the smallest degree to the patronage of the Executive.

It was a needless memento to the House, or to the nation, to tell them that the gentleman and his friends opposed the repeal of the internal taxes. It would never be forgotten who had laid them on, nor who had taken them off. The people would never forget that the men who had given up that source of revenue and swept off a host of those blood-suckers, the excise men, had rapidly diminished the debt, and acquired Louisiana without laying one additional tax. They will pay the duties proposed in this bill with cheerful confidence, which they repose in its tried and faithful agents, in men who never draw a cent from their pockets but when the public exigency requires it. This language might be reprehended as boastful, but there were occasions when it was treachery to our principles not to assert them with freedom and boldness. He would never pusillanimously sit still and see an attempt to delude the public opinion, without endeavoring to expose it.

There was but one point on which he differed from his friend from Maryland. He could not deplore the opposition which this measure had received from a certain quarter. He conceived it a criterion of its merit. In the political, as in the physical world, there must be a centrifugal as well as a centripetal power. In no other manner, said Mr. R. can the harmony of this sphere be preserved. And so far from deprecating opposition, such as we have seen to-day, I invite it. I shall ever prefer the fair adversary who meets me in the field of open enmity, to the skulking assassin who declines the public combat only that he may spring upon me in an unguarded moment.

Mr. HUGER said he had only rose to observe that if this clause were retained, he should, notwithstanding, vote for the bill. He was perfectly ready to meet any expense necessary to support the national interest and character. He believed other modes than that pointed out by the bill would be better. He would prefer borrowing the sum; and that a tax on carriages should be laid to pay the interest.

The question on striking out the first section was taken by yeas and nays—yeas 28, nays 77, as follows:

on its passage. It was his wish to show that those most averse to this mode of raising revenue from its inequality and oppression, were, notwithstanding, ready to vote for carrying the great object of the bill into effect.

Mr. J. C. SMITH said he was sorry that the appropriation made and the mode of obtaining revenue to meet it, were incorporated in the same bill. As to the first object of the bill, there was no division in the House; on the second there was a diversity of opinion. He was persuaded, it was not proper at present to raise more revenue. Gentlemen, however, were determined to preserve the first section; and the responsibility of it must rest with them. However we may dislike it, approving of the great object of the bill, we must vote for it.

The question was taken by yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and carried unanimously in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays none:

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

Mr. NICHOLSON offered a resolution declaratory of the opinion of Congress, that the first section of the act providing for persons disabled by known wounds received during the Revolutionary war, &c., should be so construed, as to include all persons, who, in consequence of disability arising from known wounds, resigned their commissions.

Mr. SMILIE opposed the motion, under the idea that one act of Congress could only be explained by another act of the same kind.

Mr. NICHOLSON said this was as much a Legislative act as though it began with the words, "be it enacted."

Mr. J. C. SMITH suggested the propriety of accommodating the style to the phraseology of the laws. He was of opinion that one solemn act of legislation could only be superseded by an act equally sacred.

Mr. CAMPBELL expressed the same opinion.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON the resolution was referred to a committee empowered to report by bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. J. C. SMITH, from the committee this day appointed, presented, according to order, a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States during the Revolutionary war;" which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-day.

LOUISIANA BILL.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the managers appointed to confer with the managers of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Louisiana bill, made a report recommending that the House should recede from their amendment, proposing a substitute for the fourth section of the bill as it came from the Senate. The substitute provides for the election of a Legislative Council by the people of Louisiana. Mr. N. observed that the managers on the part of the Senate, had represented that the election of a Legislative Council by the people of Louisiana would be attended with inconveniences which he, for one, had never perceived before. It was stated by one of the managers who had been in Louisiana, and by another well acquainted with the situation of the country, that the settlements there were usually in parishes in which the inhabitants were generally of one description. Some of those parishes were entirely composed of Spaniards, some of French, some of Germans, and some of Creoles. If each of them were to send a member, the Legislative body would be composed of persons of different languages. The representatives of no two parishes would perhaps speak the same language. This, Mr. N. said, was the principal reason which induced the managers to recommend that the House should recede. There were other reasons, of a very powerful nature, which it was not necessary for him to state.

Mr. SMILIE declared himself in favor of receding, as he wished the bill passed, under the conviction that without the proposed new section, it would provide for the people of Louisiana a better government than they at present enjoyed.

Mr. ALSTON observed, that in consequence of a limitation in the bill, it would expire in one year, which would be antecedent to the time when the contemplated Legislative Council, as eligible by the people, would be organized. He was therefore in favor of receding.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on receding from the first amendment, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 51, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jun., Isaac Anderson, Simeon Baldwin, David Bard, Walter Bowie, Adam Boyd, Robert Brown, Joseph Bryan, John Campbell, Thomas Claiborne, Joseph Clay, Jacob Crowninshield, John B. Earle, Peter Early, William Findley, John Fowler, Jas. Gillespie, Thomas Griffin, Samuel Hammond, Josiah Hasbrouck, James Holland, David Holmes, Benj. Huger, Walter Jones, Nehemiah Knight, Andrew McCord, William McCreery, Samuel L. Mitchell, Andrew Moore, Nicholas R. Moore, Thomas Moore, Thomas Newton, jr., Joseph H. Nicholson, John Randolph, John Rea of Pennsylvania, John Rhea of Tennessee, Jacob Richards, Thos. Sammons, Thomas Sandford, John Smilie, John Smith

NAYS—John Archer, George Michael Bedinger, Silas Betton, William Blackledge, William Chamberlin, Martin Chittenden, Clifton Claggett, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Davenport, John Dawson, Thomas Dwight, James Elliot, Ebenezer Elmer, Gaylord Griswold, Roger Griswold, Seth Hastings, Joseph Heister, William Hoge, David Hough, William Kennedy, Michael Leib, Joseph Lewis, jr., Henry W. Livingston, Matthew Lyon, David Meriwether, Nahum Mitchell, Jeremiah Morrow, Anthony New, Gideon Olin, Beriah Palmer, John Patterson, Thomas Plater, Ebenezer Seaver, Tompson J. Skinner, James Sloan, John Cotton Smith, Richard Stanford, William Stedman, Samuel Taggart, Samuel Thatcher, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, Joseph B. Varnum, Lemuel Williams, and Marmaduke Williams.

The managers further recommended that the House should insist on their amendment declaring null all grants subsequent to the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, with an amendment saving bona fide grants to a certain extent, made to actual settlers.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD said he should vote against the amendment, with the view of afterwards voting against insisting on the original amendment.

Mr. NICHOLSON and Mr. SMILIE said a few words in favor of agreeing to the amendment, when the question was taken on concurring with the report of the managers, and carried—yeas 54.

A message was received from the Senate, stating their agreement to the report of the committee of conference on the Louisiana bill, which was consequently passed.

[It may not be unsatisfactory here to state that the bill, as finally passed, is limited in duration to one year from the first day of October next, (when it is to take effect) and thence to the end of the next session of Congress. It directs the appointment by the President of a Governor, to hold his office for four years; the appointment annually of a Legislative Council, composed of inhabitants of Louisiana, and the appointment of judges. It will be perceived that the principle of the Senate, withholding for the present the right of suffrage from the people of Louisiana, prevailed, subject, however, to the limitation of time introduced in the bill by the House of Representatives.]

EXTINGUISHMENT OF DEBTS.

Mr. CLAIBORNE called up the bill making further provision for extinguishing debts due by the United States.

Mr. LEIB said he was friendly to the principle of the bill, but despaired, from the late period of the session, of its passage; he therefore moved its postponement to the first Monday of December.

Mr. ELMER expressed a coincidence of sentiment with Mr. LEIB.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said, it was well known to the House that he was friendly to the bill; he was, however, sensible it was too late to act upon it during the present session. His only wish therefore, at this time, was to put the bill in such a respectful situation as would recommend it to the early attention of Congress at their next session. He therefore acquiesced in the postponement.

The motion of postponement was then carried without a division.

PUNISHMENT OF CRIMES.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, to punish certain crimes against the United States.

The first section of the bill was read. It provides for the punishing with death, any person who shall willfully burn, sink, or destroy any vessel.

Mr. LEIB moved to strike out "with death," and to insert, "by imprisonment not exceeding fourteen years."

This amendment gave rise to a debate of some interest and length, on the comparative advantages of sanguinary and mild punishments, and on the relative magnitude of the offence, the punishment of which was under consideration.

Messrs. LEIB, SMILIE, J. CLAY, ELMER, and STANTON supported, and Messrs. NICHOLSON, HOLLAND, GRISWOLD, SOUTHARD, THATCHER, and MACON opposed the amendment, which, on the question being taken, was negatived—yeas 32.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DAWSON moved that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolutions offered by him, for the recession of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUGER said this point had been fully and ably investigated the last session. He did not expect, after the decision then made, that the House would have been again called upon to discuss it. He believed the mind of every member was made up respecting it. He hoped, therefore, the House would not agree to go into Committee.

Mr. J. LEWIS said he should vote against the House resolving itself into a Committee of the Whole, and should that motion be negatived, he would move to discharge the Committee of the Whole from all further consideration of the resolutions. The question was taken on going into Committee, and lost—Yeas 20.

Mr. J. LEWIS then moved to discharge the Committee. This motion was carried without debate—yeas 53, embracing a great majority of the members present.

INDIANA TERRITORY.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill making an addition to the salaries of the Governor, Judges, and Secretary, of the Indiana Territory.

The bill adds to the salary of the Governor, $500; to that of the Judges, $400; and to that of the Secretary, $375, for two years from the first of October next.

Mr. EARLY spoke in favor of the bill, on the ground that, by the annexation of Louisiana to the Indiana Territory, the duties of these officers were greatly increased.

Mr. LYON opposed the bill, and moved to amend it by striking out the additional compensation allowed to the Governor.

Messrs. LEIB and CLAY advocated the amendment, when the question was taken on Mr. LYON's motion, and carried—yeas 51.

Mr. MACON moved to strike out, "to the Judges, each $400." He observed that it was an incorrect procedure to give Judges a temporary salary.

Mr. MORROW opposed the motion, which was then agreed to—yeas 47.

The Committee then rose and reported progress, when leave was refused to them to sit again, and the bill was then postponed to the first Monday of December.

SATURDAY, March 24.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels,' with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee to whom was committed, on the twenty-first instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of William A. Barron," made a report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the further consideration of the said bill be postponed until the first Monday in November next.

An engrossed bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States during the Revolutionary war," was read the third time and passed.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee to whom were referred, on the twenty-third instant, the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the disposal of the public lands in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes," made a report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to all the amendments of the Senate to the said bill, except the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth of the said amendments, which were, on the question severally put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee appointed on the part of this House to attend a conference with the Senate on the subject-matter of the sixteenth amendment, depending between the two Houses, to the bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads, and for other purposes," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels.'" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments.

On motion, it was

House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers, be postponed until the first Monday in November next.

The House proceeded to consider a motion of the seventeenth instant, relative to "the expediency of providing by law for exhibiting and registering all evidences of title and claims for land within the territories ceded by the French Republic to the United States, by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, 1803," which lay on the table: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said motion be postponed until the first Monday in November next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their sixteenth amendment, disagreed to by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads, and for other purposes;" and desire a farther conference with this House on the subject-matter of the said amendment; to which farther conference the Senate have appointed managers on their part. The Senate recede from their twenty-fourth amendment to the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the disposal of the public lands in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes;" and they do insist on their twenty-fifth amendment to the said bill. The Senate desire a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the said twenty-fifth amendment, and have appointed managers at the said conference on their part.

The House proceeded to reconsider the sixteenth amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads, and for other purposes;" as also, to consider the report of the joint committee of conference, made this day, on the subject-matter thereof: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth adhere to their disagreement to the said sixteenth amendment.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Moses Young;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter and report from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with two statements, marked A and B, respecting the "moneys which, since the establishment of the present Government, have been paid as fees to assistant counsel, and for legal advice in the business of the United States;" prepared in pursuance of a resolution of this House, of the third instant; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act concerning the public buildings in the City of Washington," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Moses Young;" was read twice and committed to the Committee of Claims.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, authorizing the payment of $2,800 to Philip Sloan.

The Committee rose and reported their agreement to the bill; which the House ordered to a third reading, and passed—yeas 66.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to make further appropriations for the purpose of extinguishing the Indian claims;" and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported without amendment.

The said bill was then read the third time and passed.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the managers appointed on the part of this House, to attend a conference with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the twenty-fifth amendment, disagreed to by this House, and insisted on by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the disposal of the public lands in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes," made a report thereon; which was read, and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth insist on their disagreement to the said twenty-fifth amendment to the bill.

ACCOUNTS OF DEPARTMENTS.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, to amend the laws providing for the organization of the accounting offices of the Treasury, War and Navy Departments.

Mr. DANA observed that this appeared to be a bill for the revival of the office of Commissioner of Loans. This might be necessary; but as there had been no report on the subject, he was not prepared to say that the measure was necessary.

Mr. NICHOLSON called for the reading of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means and an accompanying letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which were read.

The Committee rose and reported the bill.

The House immediately took it up, and ordered it to a third reading. The bill was accordingly read the third time, and on the question whether the same shall pass?

Mr. CONRAD desired the taking of the yeas and nays. Mr. C. said that he had expected a very different bill from the present, in consequences of the resolutions entered into by the House at an early stage of the session. It was then generally expected that two offices would be abolished; it now appeared that it was contemplated to create a new office. He trusted the bill would not pass.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, by yeas and nays, and passed in the negative—yeas 42. nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jr., John Archer, David Bard, William Blackledge, Adam Boyd, Joseph Bryan, George W. Campbell, Matthew Clay, Jacob Crowninshield, Richard Cutts, John B. And so the said bill was rejected.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The House took up the amendment proposed by the Senate, to the bill entitled "An act concerning the public buildings at the City of Washington:" Whereupon, the said amendment being twice read, to strike out in the fourth, fifth, and sixth lines of the original bill, the following words, to wit: "proceeding with the public buildings at the City of Washington, and in making such necessary improvements and repairs thereon, as he shall deem expedient:" and to insert, in lieu thereof, the following words, "finishing the President's House in such manner as will accommodate both Houses of Congress; and for the purpose of renting, purchasing, or building a suitable house for the accommodation of the President:"

Messrs. J. RANDOLPH, and SLOAN supported; and Messrs. LEWIS, SMILIE, DAWSON, CLAIBORNE, and ELMER opposed this amendment; when the question was taken by yeas and nays on agreeing to it and passed in the negative—yeas 27, nays 76, as follows:

Ordered, That this House doth disagree to the said amendment.

MONDAY, March 26.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendment, disagreed to by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act concerning the public buildings at the City of Washington;" and desire a conference thereon with this House; to which they have appointed managers on their part.

Ordered, That the committee who were directed by a resolution of this House, of the twenty-fourth of November last, "to inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts providing for the sale of the public lands of the United States," to whom were referred, during the present session, the petitions and memorials of sundry inhabitants of Fairfield county, in the State of Ohio; of Zaccheus Biggs, and others, receivers of public moneys; of sundry citizens residing between the Great and Little Miami rivers, in the State of Ohio; of sundry inhabitants of the said State of Ohio; of sundry inhabitants of the counties of Knox, St. Clair, and Randolph, in the Indiana Territory of the United States; of sundry claimants to lands between the Great and Little Miamia rivers, and above what is usually termed Ludlow's line, in the State of Ohio; of sundry citizens claiming the right of pre-emption to certain lands in the Miamia country, within and above said Ludlow's line; of sundry inhabitants of Claiborne county, in the Mississippi Territory of the United States; and, also, the affidavits and certificates of Jonathan Donnalld, and others, in opposition to the prayer of a petition presented the eighteenth of January last; be discharged from the consideration of the same.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was committed, on the twenty-fourth instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Moses Young," reported that the committee had, according to order, had the said bill under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their agreement to the same: Whereupon, the bill was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act providing for a Naval Peace Establishment, and for other purposes,'" with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House to whom were committed, on the eleventh of January last, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the sale of the frigate General Greene, and a further addition to the naval armament of the United States, and a report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures thereon, be discharged therefrom; and that the farther consideration of the said bill and report be postponed until the first Monday in November next.

Ordered, That the farther consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the further protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States," together with the amendments proposed by the Senate thereto, on the twenty-eighth of November last, be postponed until the first Monday in November next.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the conference desired by the Senate on the subject-matter of their amendment to the bill, entitled "An act concerning the Public Buildings at the City of Washington;" and that Mr. J. LEWIS, jun., Mr. VARNUM, and Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL, be appointed managers at the said conference, on the part of this House.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE CHASE.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed on the thirteenth instant, to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, made a report thereon; which was read, as follows:

Report of the committee appointed to prepare articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him, for high crimes and misdemeanors.

ARTICLE 1. That, unmindful of the solemn duties of his office, and contrary to the sacred obligation by which he stood bound to discharge them "faithfully and impartially, and without respect to persons," the said Samuel Chase, on the trial of John Fries, charged with treason, before the circuit court of the United States, held for the district of Pennsylvania, in the city of Philadelphia, during the months of April and May, one thousand eight hundred, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, did, in his judicial capacity, conduct himself in a manner highly arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust, viz:

1. In delivering an opinion in writing, on the question of law, on the construction of which the defence of the accused materially depended, tending to prejudice the minds of the jury against the case of the said John Fries, the prisoner, before counsel had been heard in his defence.

2. In restricting the counsel for the said Fries from recurring to such English authorities as they believed apposite, or from citing certain statutes of the United States, which they deemed illustrative of the positions, upon which they intended to rest the defence of their client.

3. In debarring the prisoner from his Constitutional privilege of addressing the jury (through his counsel) on the law, as well as on the fact, which was to determine his guilt, or innocence, and at the same time endeavoring to wrest from the jury their indisputable right to hear argument, and determine upon the question of law, as well as the question of fact, involved in the verdict which they were required to give.

ART. 2. That, in consequence of this irregular conduct of the said Samuel Chase, as dangerous to our liberties as it is novel to our laws and usages, the said John Fries was deprived of the right, secured to him by the eighth article amendatory of the Constitution, and was condemned to death without having been heard, by counsel, in his defence, to the disgrace of the character of the American bench, in manifest violation of law and justice, and in open contempt of the rights of juries, on which ultimately rest the liberty and safety of the American people.

ART. 3. That, prompted by a similar spirit of persecution and injustice, at a circuit court of the United States, held at Richmond, in the month of May, 1800, for the district of Virginia, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, and before which a certain James Thompson Callender was arraigned for a libel on John Adams, then President of the United States, the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said Callender, did overrule the objection of John Basset, one of the jury, who wished to be excused from serving on the trial, because he had made up his mind as to the publication from which the words, charged to be libellous, in the indictment, were extracted; and the said Basset was accordingly sworn, and did serve on the said jury.

ART. 4. That the evidence of John Taylor, a material witness on behalf of the aforesaid Callender, was not permitted by the said Samuel Chase to be given in, because the said witness could not prove the truth of the whole of one of the charges contained in the indictment, although the said charge embraced more than one fact.

ART. 5. That the conduct of the said Samuel Chase was marked, during the whole course of the said trial, by manifest injustice, partiality, and intemperance, viz:

1. In refusing to postpone the trial, although an affidavit was regularly filed, stating the absence of material witnesses on behalf of the accused.

2. In the use of unusual, rude, and contemptuous expressions towards the prisoner's counsel; and in insinuating that they wished to excite the public fears and indignation, and to produce that insubordination to law to which the conduct of the judge did at the same time manifestly tend.

3. In repeated and vexatious interruptions of the said counsel, on the part of the said judge, which at length induced them to abandon their cause and their client, who was thereupon convicted and condemned to fine and imprisonment.

4. In an indecent solicitude, manifested by the said Samuel Chase, for the conviction of the accused, unbecoming even a public prosecutor, but highly disgraceful to the character of a judge, as it was subversive of justice.

ART. 6. That, at a circuit court of the United States, for the district of Delaware, held at Newcastle, in the month of June, one thousand eight hundred, whereat

H. OF R.

MARCH, 1804.

the said Samuel Chase presided—the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties of his office, did descend from the dignity of a judge and stoop to the level of an informer, by refusing to discharge the grand jury, although entreated by several of the said jury so to do; and after the said grand jury had regularly declared, through their foreman, that they had found no bills of indictment, nor had any presentments to make, by observing to the said grand jury, that he, the said Samuel Chase, understood “that a highly seditious temper had manifested itself in the State of Delaware, among a certain class of people, particularly in Newcastle county, and more especially in the town of Wilmington, where lived a most seditious printer, unrestrained by any principle of virtue, and regardless of social order—that the name of this printer was”—but checking himself, as if sensible of the indecorum which he was committing, added, “that it might be assuming too much to mention the name of this person, but it becomes your duty, gentlemen, to inquire diligently into this matter;” and that with intention to procure the prosecution of the printer in question, the said Samuel Chase did, moreover, authoritatively enjoin on the District Attorney of the United States the necessity of procuring a file of the papers to which he alluded, (and which were understood to be those published under the title of “Mirror of the Times and General Advertiser,”) and by a strict examination of them to find some passage which might furnish the ground-work of a prosecution against the printer of the said paper; thereby degrading his high judicial functions, and tending to impair the public confidence in, and respect for, the tribunals of justice, so essential to the general welfare.

ART. 7. And whereas mutual respect and confidence between the Government of the United States and those of the individual States, and between the people and those Governments, respectively, are highly conducive to that public harmony, without which there can be no public happiness, yet the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties and dignity of his judicial character, did, at a circuit court, for the district of Maryland, held at Baltimore, in the month of May, one thousand eight hundred and three, pervert his official right and duty to address the grand jury then and there assembled, on the matters coming within the province of the said jury, for the purpose of delivering to the said grand jury an intemperate and inflammatory political harangue, with intent to excite the fears and resentment of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland, against their State government and constitution—a conduct highly censurable in any, but peculiarly indecent and unbecoming in a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, moreover, that the said Samuel Chase, then and there, under pretence of exercising his judicial right to address the said grand jury, as aforesaid, did, in a manner, highly unwarrantable, endeavor to excite the odium of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland, against the Government of the United States, by delivering opinions, which, even if the judicial authority were competent to their expression, on a suitable occasion and in a proper manner, were at that time, and as delivered by him, highly indecent, extra judicial, and tending to prostrate the high judicial character with which he was invested to the low purpose of an electioneering partisan.

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any farther articles, or other accusation or impeachment against the said Samuel Chase, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the said articles, or any of them, and offering proof to all and every the aforesaid articles, and to all and every other article, impeachment, or accusation, which shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall require, do demand that the said Samuel Chase may be put to answer the said crimes and misdemeanors, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments, may be thereupon had and given, as are agreeable to law and justice.

Ordered, That the said report be printed for the use of the members of both Houses; and that the Clerk of this House be directed to transmit to each of the members of the two Houses of Congress, a copy of the said report, as soon as the same shall be printed.

Ordered, That there be a call of the House tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock.

The House adjourned until four o'clock, post meridian.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution, that the resolution of the two Houses authorizing the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives to adjourn their respective Houses on this day, be rescinded; and that the said President and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session, by adjourning their respective Houses on Tuesday, the 27th of this month; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate adhere to their amendment, disagreed to by this House to the bill, entitled “An act supplementary to the act, entitled ‘An act providing for a Naval Peace Establishment, and for other purposes.’”

The House proceeded to consider the resolution of the Senate to rescind the resolution of both Houses, of the thirteenth instant, for an adjournment of the two Houses of Congress, on this day; and authorizing the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, to close the present session, by adjourning their respective Houses on Tuesday the 27th of the present month: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said resolution of the Senate.—Yeas 49, nays 44, as follows:

the public lands of the United States to which the Indian title has been or shall hereafter be extinguished, north of the river Ohio, and east of the river Mississippi; and it shall be the duty of the said surveyor general to cause the said lands to be surveyed into townships, six miles square, and divided in the same manner and under the same regulations; and to do and perform all such other acts in relation to the said lands, as is provided by law in relation to the lands of the United States, situate northwest of the river Ohio and above the mouth of Kentucky river: Provided, That the whole expense of surveying and marking the line shall not exceed three dollars for every mile that shall be actually run, surveyed, and marked: And provided also, That such tracts of land as are lawfully claimed by individuals within the said boundaries, and the title whereof has been or shall be recognised by the United States, shall be laid out and surveyed at the expense of the parties respectively, in conformity with the true boundaries of such tracts. And it shall also be the duty of the said surveyor general to cause to be run, surveyed, and marked such of the Indian boundary lines of the said lands, as have not yet been surveyed; and with the approbation of the President of the United States to ascertain by astronomical observations the positions of such places north of the river Ohio and east of the river Mississippi, as may be deemed necessary for the correctness of the surveys, and to the most important points of the geography of the country.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, for the disposal of the lands of the United States north of the river Ohio and east of the river Mississippi, in the Indiana Territory, three land offices shall be established in the same, one at Detroit, for the lands lying north of the State of Ohio to which the Indian title has been extinguished; one at Vincennes for the lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, and which are included within the boundaries fixed by the treaty lately held with the Indian tribes of the Wabash; and one at Kaskaskia, for so much of the lands included within the boundaries fixed by the treaty of the thirteenth of August, one thousand eight hundred and three, with the Kaskaskia tribe of Indians, as is not claimed by any other Indian tribe; and for each of the said offices a register and a receiver of public moneys shall be appointed, who shall give security in the same manner, in the same sums, and whose compensation, emoluments and duties, and authority, shall, in every respect, be the same in relation to the lands which shall be disposed of at their offices, as are or may be by law provided, in relation to the registers and the receivers of public moneys in the several offices established for the disposal of the lands of the United States north of the river Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted. That the register and receiver of public moneys, of the three above mentioned land offices, shall, for the land respectively lying within their districts, be commissioners for the purpose of examining the claims of persons claiming lands by virtue of the preceding sections. SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all the public lands of the United States, the sale of which is authorized by law, may, after they shall have been offered for sale to the highest bidder in quarter sections, as hereinafter directed, be purchased at the option of the purchaser, either in entire sections, in half sections, or in quarter sections; in which two last cases the sections shall be divided into half sections by lines running due north and south, and the half sections shall be divided into quarter sections by lines running due east and west. And in every instance in which a subdivision of the lands of the United States, as surveyed in conformity with law, shall be necessary to ascertain the boundaries or true contents of the tract purchased, the same shall be done at the expense of the purchaser.

An Act supplementary to the act, entitled "An act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President in case of vacancies in the offices both of President and Vice President."

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever the amendment proposed during the present session of Congress, to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the manner of voting for President and Vice President of the United States, shall have been ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, the Secretary of State shall forthwith cause a notification thereof to be made to the Executive of every State, and shall also cause the same to be published in at least one of the newspapers printed in each State, in which the laws of the United States are annually published. The Executive authority of each State shall cause a transcript of the said notification to be delivered to the electors appointed for that purpose, who shall first thereafter meet in such State, for the election of a President and Vice President of the United States; and whenever the said electors shall have received the said transcript of notification, or whenever they
